BUT Onias the sonne of the high Priest, called also Onias (who flying out of his country lived in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor, as we have heretofore declared) seeing all Judea destroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending in his heart to purchase an immortall memory, he determined to beseech the King Ptolomey; and the Queen Cleopatra by Letters, that it might be lawfull for him to build a Temple in Egypt, resembling in all points that which was at Jerusalem, and that he might have libertie to plant Levites and Priests in the same, of his own kindred: And hereunto was he especially moved, by a certain prophecie of Isaiah, who more then six hundred yeers before, had foretold that a Temple should be assuredly builded in Egypt, in honour of the Almighty God by a Jew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, he wrote a Letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect: During the time that I was employed in your warres, and by Gods favourable assistance have done you many services, I have visited Coelosyria and Phoenicia, and have been in the Citie of Leontopolis (which is in the territories of Heliopolis.) I have also visited divers other places, wherein the Jews have Temples, against all right and honestie: which is the cause that they agree not among themselves: as also the like hath happened among the Egyptians, through the multitude of Temples, and the great diversitie of religions. And having found out a very convenient place neer a Castle called Bubastis in the Plain, where there is store of all sorts of stufte for building and cattell fit for sacrifice, I beseech you that it may be lawfull for me to purifie the Temple that is levelled in that place with the ground, and dedicated to no sacred power; and that in the place thereof, it may be lawfull for me to erect and build a Temple in honour of the highest God, according to the pattern and the same dimensions of that Temple, which is in Jerusalem, for the preservation and prosperitie both of you, your Queen, and children; and to the intent that those Jews that dwell in Egypt may assemble and serve God therein; for that by how much the more there is unitie and concord among themselves, by so much the more may they be disposed to your service. For to this effect is the prophecie of Isaiah, which saith thus: There shall be (saith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many other things also hath he foretold as touching this place.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrote unto King Ptolomey. And by his answer which he made hereunto, a man may easily conjecture what pietie was both in him, and Cleopatra his sister, and wife. For they have returned the sinne and transgression of the Law, which through this means fell upon Onias head, by this answer that ensueth: King Ptolomey and Queen Cleopatra to Onias the high Priest, Health. We have perused your Letters, by which you require us to give you licence to cleanse the Temple, that is defaced at Leontopolis, in the seigniory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubastis in the Plain. We marvell very much, that a Temple builded in a place so unclean and full of execrable beasts, should be agreeable unto God: but since that you inform us, that the Prophet Isaiah did long time since prophecy the same, we give you licence, if it may be done according to the law, and with this condition, that we commit not any sinne against God.

Upon this answer, Onias (taking possession of the place) builded therein a Temple, and erected an Altar unto God, according to the module of the Temple of Jerusalem; but farre lesse, and lesse rich. Yet think I it no wayes requisite to declare the dimensions thereof, neither the vessels in the same, because I describe them particularly in my seventh book of the warres, and captivitie of the Jews: neither wanted there some Levites and Priests, who being answerable to Onias in devotion and zeal, frequented the divine Service in that place, and renewed the ceremonies. But let this suffice for the present as touching the Temple.

But it came to passe, that the Jews of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the service and worship of the Temple upon the mount Garizim, under Alexander the great, fell at oddes, and debated their differences before Ptolomey. For the Jews said that the Temple in Jerusalem

A Jerusalem builded, according to Moses laws and ordinances, was the lawfull Temple; but the Samaritanes maintained, that that which was builded on mount Garizim, was the true Temple. They therefore besought the King that it would please him to sit in judgement, with the assistance of his friends, to hear their allegations in this behalf, and to condemne the party unto death, who should be found faulty in his proceffe. Now the advocates which pleaded for the Samaritans, were Sabbas and Theodotus; and Andronicus the sonne of Mefal defended the cause of those of Jerusalem, and the other Jews. And both of them swore both by God and the King, that they would bring their proves according to the law, beseeching Ptolomey to adjudge him to death, whom he should finde to have falsified his oath. The King therefore sate down with his friends, both to hear the cause, and determine upon their differences. But the Jews of Alexandria were sore moved and displeased against them, that had drawn the preeminence of the Temple in Jerusalem into question, and were highly discontent that a Temple so ancient and famous, and so esteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, should in such sort be disgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbas and Theodotus suffered Andronicus to declaim first: who began to approve the lawfulness, holiness, and religion of the Temple in Jerusalem out of the Law; and by the successive government of the high Priests, who from father to sonne, and from hand to hand, had received this honour, therein alleading that all the Kings of Asia had honoured the Majestie of that place with presents and rich oblations: whereas neither in record of men, nor course of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had been in any estimation. By these and such like words, Andronicus perswaded the King, that the Temple of Jerusalem was builded according to the ordinance of Moses, inviting him to adjudge Sabbas and Theodotus to death. This may suffice as touching the differences of the Jews of Alexandria, and such things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

CHAP. VII.

ALEXANDER after DEMETRIUS death, honoured JONATHAN greatly.

AFTER that Demetrius was slain in fight (according as we have heretofore declared) Alexander was King of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter answerable to his dignitie, to contract affinitie with him; first, since he had obtained his fathers Empire by the favour of God: and next, for that he had overcome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing eare to these his demands, and entertaining them with great pleasure, wrote back that he was very glad that he had recovered his fathers kingdome; promising him to give him his daughter in marriage, giving him to understand, that he would meet him at Ptolemais, and bring his daughter unto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After he had written these letters, Ptolomey made his speedie repair to Ptolemais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra; where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointment) he delivered him his daughter, with such a dowry of gold and silver, as well becomed his kingly magnificence. Unto the solemnising of this marriage, Alexander by letters invited the high Priest Jonathan, commanding him to repair unto him to Ptolemais. Where, after he was arrived, and had both presented his service with other magnificent presents to both the kings, he was highly honoured by both, insomuch as Alexander constrained him to put off his ordinarie garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to sit upon a royall Throne: commanding his Captains to march before him thorow the Citie; and to command by publike edict, that no man should dare to speak any thing against him, neither offer him any cause of discontent in what sort soever. All which the Captains performed; so that they, who purposely and maliciously repaired thither to accuse him, seeing the honour that was done unto him by this publication, fled away hastily, for fear lest some mishap should befall them. This King Alexander loved Jonathan so intirely, that he afforded him the chiefest place amongst the number of his dearest friends.

DEMETRIUS the sonne of DEMETRIUS overcometh ALEXANDER, obtaineth the Kingdome, and contracteth friendship with JONATHAN.

IN the hundred, sixtie and fiftie year (of the reigne of the Greeks) Demetrius the sonne of Demetrius (accompanied with divers hired souldiers, whom Lasthenes Candidos furnished him with) departed out of Candia, & came into Cilicia. Which news as soon as Alexander heard, he was grievously vexed and troubled: for which cause he instantly posted from Phoenicia to Antioch, with intent to assure the affairs of his kingdome in that place, before the arrivall of Demetrius. He left behinde him for his Governour in Coelosyria Apollonius Darius: who coming unto Jamnia with a great army, sent a messenger unto the high Priest Jonathan, signifying unto him, that it was not convenient that he onely should live in assurance at his own ease and in authority, without submitting himself unto a King; and that it was a great indignitie for him in all mens eyes, for that he had not inforced himself to stoop under the obedience of a King. For which cause (said he) deceive not thy self, neither hope thou by sculking in the mountains, or depending on thy forces, to continue thy greatnesse; but if thou trustest to thy power, come down into the field, and encounter with me and my army in the Plain, to the end that the issue of the victory may shew which of us is most valiant. Be not thou so ignorant that the noblest of every City bear arms under one, who have alwayes overcome thy predecessors. For which cause I challenge thee to meet me in that place where we may use our swords and no stones, and where the vanquished shall have no advantage by his flight. Jonathan whetted by this bitter message, chose out ten thousand of his best souldiers, and departed from Jerusalem accompanied with his brother Simon, and came unto Joppe, and encamped without the City (because the citizens had shut the gates against him) for they had a garrison planted in that place by Apollonius. But as soon as he addressed himself to batter the Citie, the inhabitants were afraid, for fear lest he should surprize the same by force, and for that cause they opened him the gates. Apollonius understanding that Joppe was taken by Jonathan, he took three thousand horsemen, and eight thousand footmen with him, and came into Azot, whence he departed, leading out his army with a sober march, foot by foot, and arriving at Joppe, he retired back to draw Jonathan into the field, assuring himself upon his horsemen, and grounding his hope of victory upon them. But Jonathan issuing out boldly, pursued Apollonius as farre as Azot: who finding himself in the champain field, turned back upon him and charged him. Jonathan was in no sort abashed to see the thousand horsemen, that Apollonius had laid in ambush neer unto a certain stream, to the end they might charge the Jews behinde, but disposed his army in such sort, that his souldiers on every side turned their faces upon the enemy, commanding his men to defend themselves on both sides, fighting with those that assailed them either in the vanguard or the rereward. This battell continued untill evening, and Jonathan had given his brother Simon a part of his forces, charging him to set upon the enemies battell: as for himself, he drew himself and his souldiers into a form of a battalion resembling a Tortoise, to the end that being covered with their bucklers, joyned the one with the other, they might bear off the horsemens arrows: to which all of them shewed themselves obedient. The enemies horsemen shooting all their arrows against them, did them no harm; for they pierced not as farre as the flesh, but lighting upon the bucklers (enclosed and fastned the one within the other) they were easily beaten back and born off, and fell down being shot all in vain. But when as the enemies were wearied with shooting from betimes in the morning untill evening, and that Simon perceived they could charge no further, he set upon them with his souldiers so courageously, that he put them all to flight. The horsemen of Apollonius perceiving that the footmen were disfarraid, grew heartlesse likewise, and wearied also, for that they had fought untill the evening: and having lost the hope that they had in their footmen, they took their flight in great disorder & confusion: so that they brake their ranks of themselves, and were scattered thorow all the plain. Jonathan also pursued them as farre as Azot, and taking the City by assault, he slew divers of them, constraining the rest that were in despair to flie into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot, and taking the Citie by assault, he burned it with the villages round about, and spared not the temple of Dagon, but burned it & all those that were therein. The number as well of those that were slain in the battell, as of those that were consumed by fire in the Temple, was eight thousand men. Having therefore in this sort discomfited this army, he departed from Azot, and marched towards Ascalon: and as he was encamped without the City, the Ascalonites came out unto him, and both presented and honoured

A honoured him. He willingly entertaining their good affection, departed from thence, and journeyed towards Jerusalem charged with great spoils, which after his victory against his enemy, he drave before him, after he had spoiled the countrey.

As soon as Alexander heard that Apollonius the Generall of his army was discomfired, and forced to flie, he made a shew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was against his will that Jonathan had been molested by warre, who was both his friend and his ally. Whereupon he sent an Embassadour unto him, to signifie unto him how much he rejoyced at his victory, offering him presents and honours, with a chain of gold, such as the Kings were accustomed to give to those of their kindred: he likewise gave him Accaron and the countrey thereunto belonging, to him and his heirs for ever.

B About the same time King Ptolomey Philometor set out an army by sea, and another by land to repair into Syria, and to succour his sonne in law Alexander: and in his way all the cities entertained him very affectionately, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as farre as the citie of Azot: in which place all of them exclaimed before him, and challenged justice at his hand, for that the temple of Dagon was burned and destroyed; accusing Jonathan for the firing thereof, and the slaughter of many people therein. But Ptolomey hearing these accusations, answered them not a word: But when Jonathan came to meet him at Joppe, he courted him with royall presents, and all the honour that was possible, and after he had kept him company as farre as the flood called Eleutherus, he dismissed him, and sent him back to Jerusalem. When Ptolomey was come to Ptolemais, he hardly escaped death, and that contrary to all expectation by Alexander's own complotting, and

C Ammonius his friends mediation: Which treacherie being discovered, Ptolomey wrote unto Alexander, requiring him that Ammonius might be punished for his treason and conspiracies practised against him, which in their natures required a severe and cruell punishment. But seeing that Alexander delivered him not up into his hands, he conjectured and concluded, that he himself was the author thereof, and conceived a hainous displeasure against him. In like maner before that time Alexander had offended the Antiochians, by the means of the said Ammonius, who had loaden them with many wrongs and incommodities: but in the end Ammonius was punished for these his outrageous misdemeanors, and disgracefully slain like a woman, whilest in a womans attire, he sought to hide himself, as we have expressed it in

At that time Ptolomey began to accuse himself for bestowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refusing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate: so that he brake off the affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawn his daughter from him, he presently sent Embassadours unto Demetrius to confirm a league of peace and affinity with him, promising him to bestow his daughter upon him in marriage, and to establish him in his fathers kingdom. Demetrius very joyfull to hear of this Embassage, accepted both of the confederation and marriage. There onely remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to surmount, which was, how he might perswade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, against whom they were so grievously incensed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them, but this difficultie overcame he by this means that ensueth. The Antiochians hated Alexander, because of Ammonius (as we have expressed heretofore) and by that means were the more easily drawn to drive him out of the Citie. He perceiving himself to be thrust out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came unto Antioch, and was both by the citizens and souldiers therein, proclaimed King, and was constrained to take two Diadems, the one as King of Asia, the other as King of Egypt. He was a man of a gentle and just nature, no wayes ambitious, but such a one as did prudently forecast what was to ensue: striving by all means possible to avoid the hatred and jealousy of the Romans. For which cause (assembling the Antiochians together, he wrought so much with them, that at last he perswaded them to accept of Demetrius, assuring them that if he should receive that benefit at their hands, he would no more keep in memorie those things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father: protesting for his own part, that he would instruct him both how to order the course of his life honestly, and to manage his publike affairs rightly, and promising them that if he attempted to work them any inconvenience, he himself would be the formost to chastise him; alleading for his own part that he would content himself to be King of Egypt. And by this means the Antiochians were induced to receive Demetrius.

But when as Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great army, and was come into Syria, and had burned and spoiled the countrey of the Antiochians, Ptolomey accompanied with his sonne Demetrius (for he had already married his daughter unto him) issued out with their armies, and obtained a joynt and mutuell victory, by overcoming Alexander, who was constrained to flie into Arabia. It came to passe in that conflict, that Ptolemeis horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled and stumbled in such sort, as he threw his master on the ground: which when his enemies perceived, they ran all together upon him, and gave him divers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to have been slain, unless his guard had rescued him: notwithstanding he was so sick for four dayes space, that he could neither hear nor speak. But Zabel the Potentate of Arabia beheaded Alexander, and sent his head unto Ptolemeis, who being somewhat come unto himself after his wounds on the fifth day, and having some knowledge, heard and saw together a thing both delightfull in his eare, and pleasant in his eye, which was the death and the head of his enemy. But some few daies after, he died himself, being full of joy in that he saw his enemies fall. This Alexander surnamed Balles, reigned for the space of five years, as we have elsewhere declared.

Demetrius surnamed Nicanor, having obtained the kingdome, began through his malice to dismember Ptolemeis army, forgetting both the confederacie and affinity that he had with him, by reason of Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolemeis daughter. But the men of warre hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria to warrantize themselves from his wickednesse; notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the high Priest Jonathan having assembled an army of all the countrey of Judea, began to besiege the castle of Jerusalem, where there was a garrison of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Jewish religion, who in the beginning set light by the engines that Jonathan had raised to surprize the place, in the strength whereof they reposed too much confidence: But in the end, some of these miscreants breaking out by night, came unto Demetrius and certified him of the siege; who was sore displeased thereat, and taking a strong army with him, departed from Antioch to make warre upon Jonathan. At such time as he came to Ptolemais, he wrote to Jonathan and commanded him to come unto him: notwithstanding Jonathan gave not over the siege, but took the Elders and the Priests with him, with gold and silver, robes, and a great quantity of presents to bear unto Demetrius, and when he had delivered them into his hands, he appeased his wrath, and after he had received many honours at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his Priesthood, in as ample maner, as he enjoyed it during the time of his predecessours: And although the miscreant Jews accused him, yet did not Demetrius give them any credit. Moreover, Jonathan requiring, that for the whole countrey of Jewry, and for the three governments of Samaria, Joppe, and Galilee, he might pay no more then three hundred talents for tribute, he granted him a full exemption, and wrote his letters patents in these tearms: King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to all the nation of the Jews, peace and joy. We have sent you the copy of the letter, that we have written to Lasthenes, our father, to the end you may know the contents thereof, which is this: King Demetrius to Lasthenes his father, Joy and peace. Because the people of the Jews are our confederates, and observe our ordinances, my intent is to requite their good affection, and to assigne them the three governments of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which have been taken from Samaria and annexed to Judea. Secondly, we remit all that which our predecessours Kings received of them that sacrificed in Jerusalem: and other tributes likewise, which were gathered for the fruits of the earth and the trees, the tribute of the salt likewise, and the gold that was levied for the Crown: so that henceforward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands, either for the time present or to come. See you therefore give order that the copy of these our present letters be sent and delivered to Jonathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the sacred Temple. See here what he wrote at that time. Demetrius perceiving that the countrey was in peace, and that he lived without fear of any warre, he dismissed his army, and cashiered his souldiers; hiring onely certain strangers (who were mustred out of Candy and other Isles) whereby it came to passe that his own souldiers conceived an envie and hatred against him, in that he gave them no wages, whereas his predecessours maintained them as well in peace as in warre, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards him; and that if need required to employ them, they might shew themselves more readie and courageous to fight for them.

TRYPHON APAMENUS overcometh DEMETRIUS, and giveth the kingdome to ANTIOCHUS the sonne of ALEXANDER, and plighteth friendship with JONATHAN.

Certain man called Diodotus, and by surname Tryphon (an Apamean by nation, and Generall of Alexanders army) hearing what mutinie there was amongst Demetrius souldiers, came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the bringing up of Antiochus
Alexanders sonne, and wrought as much as in him lay, that he would commit Antiochus to his trust, to the intent he might make him King, and establish him in the sovereign government which appertained to his father. And although upon this first motion of his, he could hardly be drawn to beleve it, yet not long after, by the continuall instance of Tryphon he was perswaded to condescend, and suffered himself to be drawn by his perswas-ions. See here what this man pretended at that time. But Jonathan the high Priest, desiring that they within the cittadell of Jerusalem, and these wicked and Apostate Jews, and in generall all those that were in the garrisons thorowout all the countrey, might be displaced and dismissed; he sent Embassadors with rich presents unto Demetrius, beseeching him to cashiere those that were in garrison in the fortresses of Judea: who not onely promised him that demand, but also matters of farre greater moment, after that warre which he had then in hand, were determined. For the present troubles at that time, gave him no leisure to perform the same: he therefore praid him for the right of their friendship to send him some of his forces, giving him to understand, that his army was revolted. Whereupon Jonathan chose out three thousand fighting men, and sent them unto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both because of the injuries they had endured under him, as also for the hatred they had conceived against his father, who had in like maner done them much wrong; so that they onely expected and watched their opportunitie to expulse him. Understanding therefore that the succours that Jonathan sent unto Demetrius were at hand, and foreseeing that in short time he would gather a great army, if they hastened not themselves to prevent him betime, they betook them to their weapons, and beset the Kings Palace after the maner of a siege, and guarded all the gates with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who seeing himself roundly beset by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, took those hired souldiers (with those whom Jonathan had sent him) and charged them: but he was forced to retire, and overcome by them, who were assembled in that place to the number of many thousands. For which cause the Jews perceiving that the Antiochians had the better hand, they mounted upon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence darted and shot against them, without any endamage to themselves (by reason of the distance and height of the place where they were) notwithstanding they gauled the people grievously, in so much as they drove them from the houses neer adjoyning, which they incontinently set on fire, whereby the flame thereof was spread thorow the whole Citie; so that the houses that were close builded the one by the other, and for the most part framed of wood, were burnt down to the ground. The Antiochians perceiving that they could not remedie the fire, nor extinguish the same, betook them to flight, and the Jews chasing them from house to house, pursued them after an incredible maner. When the King perceived that the citizens of Antioch ranne here and there to save their wives and children, and for that occasion had given over the battell, he set upon them in a certain narrow streight, whereas divers of them were slain, and all at last enforced to cast down their weapons, and to yeeld themselves to Demetrius mercie, who pardoning them their rebellion, pacified that sedition. After this he rewards the Jews with part of the pillage, thanking them as the onely authors of his victo-rie. Whereupon he sent them back to Jonathan, with no small acknowledgement and testimony of their prowesse and virtue. But afterwards he discovered his evill nature towards him, and falsified his promises, menacing him to make warre upon him, except he paid him those tributes, which the people of the Jews ought, and were wont to pay unto the Kings his ancestors beforetime. And these designes of his had he executed, had not Tryphon hindred him: for he was enforced to turn those forces that he had prepared against Jonathan, to make warre upon Tryphon: who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus (who at that time was under yeers) he set the diadem upon his head.
All the army likewise that had abandoned Demetrius, for shortning them of their wages, came and followed him, and made open warre against their master, and under Antiochus

and Tryphon fought with him and overcame him, seizing both his Elephants, and the city of Antioch. Whereupon Demetrius being wholly discomfited, fled into Cilicia. But the younger Antiochus sent Embassadors and letters to Jonathan, calling him his ally and friend, confirming the Priesthood unto him, and allotted him the four governments annexed to Judea; and besides these, he gave him vessels of gold, a robe of purple, with permission to wear the same: he gave him also a pendent of gold, and enrolled him amongst his chiefest friends, and created his brother Simon Generall of his army, from the marches of Tyre as far as Egypt. Jonathan highly rejoiced at these favours of Antiochus, and sent Embassadors both unto him and Tryphon, protesting that he was their friend and ally, and that he would fight on his side against Demetrius, who neglecting those benefits which he had received (notwithstanding that in his necessitie he had been succoured by him) returned him evill for good, which he had so kindly extended towards him.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leave to levie a great army out of Syria and Phoenicia, to fight against Demetrius followers, he addressed himself incontinently into the Cities, who received him very magnificently; yet did they not afford him any men of war. Coming from thence unto Akalon, the citizens in honourable array came out to meet him with presents; whom together with the cities of Coelosyria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius part, and to follow Antiochus; to the end, that joyning themselves with him, they might all of them combine their forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefs which they had oftentimes endured by his means: and which if they prudently examined, they had many reasons to prosecute their revenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazians to be of a farre contrary disposition, then that which he expected; for they flatly resisted him: and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius, yet would they not joyn their forces, or submit the Citie to his government. For which cause Jonathan besieged their Citie, and spoiled their countrey: for with the one half of his armie he begirt Gaza; and with the other half he over-ran the countrey, spoiling and burning the same. The Gazians seeing these miseries which they were constrained to endure, and perceiving that no succours came unto them from Demetrius; but that their own overthrow was at hand, and their assistance far off, and that which was worse, most uncertain: they thought it to be the wisest part for them to forsake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they sent messengers unto Jonathan, protesting that they would be both his friends and confederates. For, men do unwillingly take knowledge of their profit, before they have bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and was most expedient for them to perform before they were afflicted, that do they earnestly hunt after, at such time as they have been chastised. Upon this submission of theirs, Jonathan received them into favour, and took pledges of them, and sent them to Jerusalem; and from thence marched he along the countrey as farre as Damasco. And whereas an huge host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as farre as the citie Cadasa, neer unto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to divert Jonathan from Syria, by succouring and relieving those of Galilee, who were their confederates: Jonathan went out speedily to meet with them, recommending the estate of Judea to the charge of his brother Simon. Who assembling all the power that was possible to be gathered thorowout all the countrey, encamped before Bethsura, a strong fort in Judea; and besieged it (for Demetrius being before-time seized thereof, kept garrison therein, as before this we have declared.) When as therefore Simon raised his bulwarks and fitted his engines to assault the Citie, and employed all his studie to surpris the same, they that were besieged waxed afraid, lest if he should take the town by force, they should lose their lives. For which cause, they sent an Herald unto Simon, requesting him that he would permit them to depart out of Bethsura with the safetie of their lives and goods, and go unto Demetrius: who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the Citie, and he planted a garrison therein of their own men, in place of the Macedonians. In the mean while Jonathan, who was in Galilee, caused his armie to dislodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where he was encamped, and marched towards the plain of Azor, without any suspicion that his enemies had been planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius souldiers had intelligence the day before that Jonathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they placed neer the mountain, preparing the rest of their forces to bid him battell in the Plain. As soon as Jonathan perceived their preparation to the battell, he arranged his army as conveniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charged the Jews upon their backs, they fearing to be inclosed, and consequently easily slain, began

Now when Jonathan had obtained this famous victory, wherein there died about some two thousand of the enemy, he returned to Jerusalem, and (seeing that by Gods providence all things fell out according as he himself desired ) he sent Embassadors unto Rome, purposely to renew the ancient league that was made betwixt them, and the people of the Jews: commanding his Embassadors upon their return from Rome, to transport themselves to Sparta, and renew their common friendship and acquaintance also in that place. As soon as they were come to Rome, and had presented themselves before the Senate, they declared how they were sent from the high Priest Jonathan, who required the renovation of their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all that which they had demanded as touching the amitie of the Jews, and gave them their Letters of recommendation to bear unto all the Kings of Asia and Europe, and to the Governours of all the Cities, commanding them to grant them free passage to return into their countrey. And in their return they passed by the Lacedemonians, and presented those Letters which Jonathan had written unto them, the copy whereof contained matters to this effect: Jonathan the high Priest of the Nation of the encounter them neer unto the Plain of Amath: for he resolved to prevent their intended G rode into Judea. Encamping therefore some fiftie furlongs off of the enemye, he sent out spies to discover of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view known all that possibly they could, returning took certain prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession the intent of the enemies was discovered unto Jonathan; which was, that they would set upon them on the sudden. But Jonathan with a provident care speedily fortified his camp, and prepared all things necessarie for defence, and placed a watch or sentinell without his hoast, keeping his souldiers up in arms all the night, and exhorting them to be both valiant and readie, foras-much as they must needs fight by night, to the end that they might not be surprisid by the subtilties and policies of their enemies. But when the Captains of Demetrius understood H that their intended purpose was discovered unto Jonathan, they were in suspence, and knew not what counsell to take: for this troubled them, because they saw that nothing would fall out to their good, without the practice of subtile means to entrap their enemies: and supposing themselves not to be of sufficient strength to bid Jonathan battell in the plain field, they therefore resolved to fle, and leave great fires thorow all their camp, to the end their enemies might think they were asleep: and so they discamped by night. On the morrow, when Jonathan drew neer their camp to bid them battell, and saw it abandoned, and conje-ctured thereby that they were fled, he followed after them; but he could not overtake them, because they had alreadye past the flood Eleutherus, and were retired into their strong holds and places of securitie. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making warre I on the Nabatheans, he spoiled their countrey, took great booties, and led away many prisoners: and from thence came to Damasco, and sold all in that place. About this very time, Simon (his brother) marching thorowout all Judea and Palestine as farre as Ascalon, planted his garrisons in all those places, and fortified them both with men and munition, and finally came to Joppe, which he took by force, and planted a great garrison therein, because he was advertised that they of Joppe intended to surrender the Citie to Demetrius forces. When Simon and Jonathan had in this sort disposed all things, they came to Jerusalem, and assembled the people together in the Temple, and perswaded them to fortifie the walls of the Citie, and to strengthen the inclosure of the Temple that was ruinated, advising them to fortifie the same with strong towers: and besides this, he caused another wall to be builded K in the middest of the Citie, to warrantize the same against the garrisons of the Cittadell, to the intent that by that means they might cut off and stop up the passages to victuall the fort.

He advised them likewise, to build farre stronger fortresses thorowout the countrey, then those that were already finished. Now when as the people had allowed of this his good advice, Jonathan gave order as touching all those things that concerned the building within the Citie, and let his brother Simon about the fortresses in the countrey. But Demetrius passing the river, came into Mesopotamia, intending at one time to take possession both of it and the Citie of Babylon; that being seized thereof, he might the better provide for all the occurrences of his kingdome. For the Greeks and Macedonians, who inhabited that coun-trei, had solicited him by often Embassadours to come unto them, promising him to subscribe to his authoritie, and to warre with him against Arsaces King of the Parthians. He L puffed up with those hopes, marched towards them with great speed, resolving with himself, that after he had overcome the Parthians (if he had any forces left him) he would wage warre with Tryphon, and easily drive him out of the kingdome of Syria. Being therefore entertained by those of the countrey with great affection, he levied a great army, and assailed Arsaces, but he lost the day, and himself was taken prisoner, as we have elsewhere declared.

CHAP. X.

DEMETRIUS is taken prisoner. TRYPHON breaketh the covenant of peace betwixt him and JONATHAN, and surpriseth and killeth him treacherously, and afterwards maketh warre against his brother SIMON.

When Tryphon understood that Demetrius affairs had so unfortunate an issue, he forsook Antiochus and his service; and complotted with himself how he might kill him and make himself King. But the fear that he had of Jonathan Antiochus friend, hindred this intent of his: For which cause he resolved first of all to deliver himself of Jonathan, and that done, afterwards to make Antiochus the young King away. Having therefore

A therefore concluded with himself to kill Jonathan by some stratagem of treason, he came from Antioch to Bethsan (which the Greeks call Scythopolis) whither Jonathan came to meet him with forty thousand chosen men, supposing that Tryphon resorted thither to make warre upon him. But he knowing that Jonathan came thither with so much strength, wrought him by presents and counterfeited courtesies; commanding his Captains to obey Jonathan, thinking by that means to perswade him that he intirely and truly loved him, and to extinguish his suspicion, to the intent he might lay hold and intrap him, at such time as he had least suspicion of him. He counselled him to dismisse his army likewise, because having cut off all occasion of warre, he had no reason to retain them, for that there was no suspicion of alteration. After this he invited Jonathan to come to Ptolemais, and to bring with him some few of his souldiers, signifying unto him that he would deliver the Citie into his hands, and re-
 B signe all the fortresses that were in the countrey to his possession, urging further, that he came into that countrey to no other end, but to performe it. Jonathan suspecting no sinister dealing, and beleeving that Tryphon spake of good and entire affection, discharged his forces, and took onely three thousand men with him, whereof two he left in Galilee, and with one thousand repaired to Ptolemais unto Tryphon. But the Ptolemaidans shutting the gates as soon as he was entred (according as Tryphon had commanded them) took Jonathan prisoner, and slew all those that attended upon him. He presently sent also part of his army unto the two thousand that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the sword: but they having notice of that which had befallen their Chieftain, taking up their arms, speedily departed out of Galilee. And although the souldiers of Tryphon exceeded them far in number, yet were they not so hardy as to try whether part were the stronger; because they knew
 C that the Jews were ready to expose themselves to all dangers, to defend their lives: and so they returned back to him that sent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

~ The people maketh SIMON Generall of their army, and declareth him the high Priest.

TH E Y of Jerusalem understanding of the surprizall of Jonathan, and the losse of his souldiers, grievously lamented for this accident, that so great a man as he was, was taken from them, in that they feared (and that not without cause) that being destitute after his decease both of his valour and prudence, the nations that were round about them, would seek their trouble and molestation: who having held themselves quiet in admiration of him, would at that time lift themselves up against them; and not onely persecute them with war, but bring them into extreme danger of their lives. Neither did their expectation deceive them. For the neighbouring nations, understanding of Jonathans death, began presently to make warre upon the Jews on all sides, as against those who had no longer any Chieftain under whose conduct they might wage warre and shew themselves valiant. And Tryphon likewise having gathered forces, was determined to ascend into Judæa, to warre against the inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiving that
 D the Citizens of Jerusalem were dismayed with the fear, which they apprehended of those rumours and new tumults of warre, and being desirous to animate them against all incursions and attempts intended by Tryphon, assembled the people in the Temple, and began to exhort them after this maner: You are not ignorant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, have voluntarily offered our selves unto death for your liberty. Since therefore, I have abundance of such like examples, and that it is the ordinary course of our family to die for our law and religion, there is no fear so great as can pluck out this resolution out of my heart, as it may plant such a desire of life in me, as to be drawn to forget all honour. Wherefore since you have such a Chieftain and Commander, as setteth light by all danger, whereby he may endure to act any thing for your safety; it behoveth you to follow
 E me courageously to what place soever I shall conduct you. For I am of no better account then were my brethren, whereby I should spare my life; neither am I lesse then they, whereby I should through negligence and cowardize shun and forsake that which they have esteemed to be honourable, as is to die for the law and the service of our God. I will make manifest therefore by all the testimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawfull brother, for I trust in God, that he will give me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliver not onely all of you, but your wives and your children from the injurie which they intended against you; and by the grace of God I will preserve the holy Temple, that it may not be ruined by their prophane hands. For, I already perceive, that the prophane nations set us at nought, and contemn you as if you had no Chieftain: and I know already that they are marching forward to fight with you. By these words Simon heartned the people, who were distracted with fear, so that they revived their spirits and conceived better hope. Whereupon all of them cried with a loud voice, that Simon was their Generall, and that he was to succeed his two valiant brethren Judas and Jonathan in the Government; and that as touching themselves, they would be obedient in all things that he should command them. He therefore assembled in one instant all the men at arms in that countrey, and hastened himself to repaire the Citie walls, defending them with high and strong towers, and sent a certain friend of his called Jonathan the sonne of Abfalon, with an army to Joppe; commanding him to expulse the inhabitants of that citie from thence, for that he feared lest they should submit themselves to Tryphon: As for himself, he remained in Jerusalem to secure the same.

Tryphon departing from Ptolomais with a great army, came into Judæa, leading his prisoner Jonathan with him. Whereupon Simon and his army went out against him as far as Adidida (a citie situate upon a mountain, at the foot whereof beginneth the Champain countrey of Judæa.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made Governour of the Jews, sent messengers unto him, intending to circumvent him by treason and policy; giving him to understand that if he were desirous of his brothers enlargement, he should send him one hundred talents of silver, and two of Jonathans children for hostages, to assure him, that being set at libertie, he should not withdraw Judæa from the obedience of the King. (For, till that present he was held and kept prisoner, by reason of the money which he ought the King.) Simon was no waies ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphons, but knew well enough that he should both lose his money, if he should deliver the same; and that his brother should not be enlarged, no though his children were delivered for hostages: on the other side he feared, lest the people should conceive sinisterly of him, as if he had bin the cause of his brothers death, both by not delivering the money, neither yet the children: Having therefore assembled the army, he declared unto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them that the whole scope of his actions were nought else but traiterous stratagems and subtilties: yet notwithstanding he told them, that he had rather send both the money and the children to Tryphon, then by refusing his conditions and demands, to be accused to have neglected the life of his brother. Simon sent therefore both the money and children of Jonathan: but Tryphon having received both, kept not his promise; but detained Jonathan: and leading his army thorow the countrey, intended to passe by Idumæa to repaire to Jerusalem. He came therefore to Dora a city in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping alwaies right over against him. They that were in the Castle of Jerusalem, hearing news hereof, sent Tryphon word that he should hasten and come unto them, and send them munition: whereupon he addressed his horsemen, pretending that very night to ride unto Jerusalem; but the snow about that time fell in such abundance, that it covered the way in such fort and was so thick, as the horses could not travell; which hindred his repaire to Jerusalem. For which cause he departed from thence, and came into Coelosyria; and speedily invading the countrey of Galaad, he put Jonathan to death in that place, and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon sent unto Basca & transported his brothers bones, and interred them in his countrey Modin in his fathers sepulchre, & all the people mourned and lamented for him many dayes. Simon also builded a great monument of white and polished marble for his father and his brethren, and raised it to a great height, and garnished it round about with galleries and pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable work to behold. Besides that, he erected seven Pyramides for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, so great and so faire, as they moved admiration in those that beheld them; and are as yet to be seen at this present day. So great was Simons care, that Jonathan and the rest of his family should be honoured with so magnificent a sepulchre: which Jonathan died, after he had exercised the place of the high Priest, and possessed the Government for foure years. Thus much as touching his death.

As soon as Simon had taken possession of the high Priesthood, by the election of the people; the very first yeer of his Government, he acquitted the people of the tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This libertie and exemption from tribute hapned amongst the Jews, one hundred and seventy years since the time that Seleucus surnamed Nicanor obtained the kingdome of Syria. And in so great honour was Simon amongst the people, that in their private contracts and publike letters, the date began from the first yeer of Simon the benefactor and Governour of the Jewish nation. For they prospered greatly under his government, and had the victory of all their neighbouring enemies round about them. For he destroyed the Cities of Gaza, Joppe, and Iamnia: he razed also the citadel of Jerusalem,

A Jerusalem, and leuell it with the ground, to the intent the enemies might be never seized thereof any more, nor retreat themselves thither to endamage the citie, as before time they had done. Which when he had brought to passe, he thought it not amisse, but very profitable, to leuell the hill whereon the Castle stood, to the intent the Temple might be the eminentest place. All this perswaded he the people to doe in a common assembly, laying before their eyes, how many evils they had suffered, by the means of the garrisons, and how much they were like to suffer hereafter, if a stranger should once more be master of the kingdome, and build a cittadel in that place. By these exhortations he perswaded the people to finish these works, and all of them began to travell without intermission both day and night, so that in the space of three years they plained the mountain, and wrought it down; and from that time forward there was nothing but the Temple that commanded the Citie. See here what Simon performed hitherto.

CHAP. XII.

NOT long after the captivitie of Demetrius, Tryphon slew Alexander the sonne of Antiochus surnamed God, notwithstanding he had the care and charge of his education for foure years, during which time he reigned; and spreading abroad a certain noyse and rumour, that the young King in exercising himselfe tortured to die, he sent his friends and familiars unto the men of warre, promising them that if they would elect and choose him King, he would give them a huge sum of money; giving them to understand, that Demetrius was a prisoner among the Parthians, and that if Antiochus his brother should obtain the kingdome, he would punish them divers waies, and revenge their revolt and rebellion, which they had committed by forsaking him. The army hoping that if they bestowed the kingdome on Tryphon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclaimed him King. But after he had attained the fulnesse of his desires, he shewed how malicious and wicked his nature was. For at such time as he was a private man, he flattered the people and made shew of moderation, and by such allurements he drew them to doe what him listed: but after he had taken possession of the kingdome, he discovered his hypocrisie, and shewed plainly that he was not unaptly called Tryphon, that is to say, a trier or mocker. By which means he drew the hearts of the better sort from him: and as for his army, they grew so much in hatred of him, that they submitted themselves to Cleopatra Demetrius wife, who had at that time shut up both her selfe and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus, surnamed the Devout, and brother to Demetrius, was driven from place to place, and had not any Citie that would entertain him for fear of Tryphon, Cleopatra sent unto him, inviting him both to be her husband, and to take the possession of the kingdome. And hereunto did she the rather draw him, partly for that she was thereunto perswaded by her friends, and partly for the fear she had, lest some one of Seleucia should betray the City to Tryphon. As soon as Antiochus was arrived in Seleucia, and that from day to day his forces increased, he marched forth into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and overcame him in battell, and drove him out of the higher Syria, and pursued him as farre as Phoenicia: where after he had retyred himselfe into Dora, a strong and impregnable Castle, he besieged him therein, and sent Embassadors to Simon, the high Priest of the Jews, to confirme a friendship and confederacy with him. Simon very courteously accepted his demands, and presently sent Antiochus both money and victuals, sufficient to furnish his army at the siege of Dora, so that in short space he was accepted amongst the number of his entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place besieged, taken and slain, after he had reigned three years.

After TRYPHON'S death, SIMON made warre against ANTIOCHUS, and drove CENDRABAEUS out of Iudaea.

BUT the innated avarice that was in Antiochus, and the malignitie of his nature made him forgetfull of those offices and services that Simon had done him: so that he sent Cendebeus his great friend with a mighty army to invade Jewry, and to surprize Simon. But he having some privie intelligence of Antiochus treachery, notwithstanding that at this time

But the young man having some inkling of their drift, retyred himselfe speedily into the city, and avoyded the danger that they complotted againg him; assuring himselfe of the good will of the people, in consideration of the benefits they had received at his fathers hands, and the hatred that they bare unto Ptolomey, who intending to enter the citie gates, was sharply repulsed by the Citizens, for that they had already entertained Hyrcanus.

Hereupon Ptolomey retyred unto a certain Castle situate beyond Jericho called Dagon: but Hyrcanus was made high Priest in his fathers stead: who after he had recommended himselfe to God by the firstling sacrifices that he offered, marched out against Ptolomey his brother in law to make warre upon him. Now when he was fully addrested to besiege the place whither Ptolomey was retired, he had the vantage in all other things; but onely by the affection that he bare unto his mother and his brethren, he was overcome. For Ptolomey having taken them, and whipt them upon the wals in all mens presence, threatned Hyrcanus that unlesse he levied his siege, he would cast them down headlong from the top of the Castle: now whereas one way Hyrcanus had a great desire to enforce and surprize the place; so also on the other side he was wholly weakned, through the desire that he had to redeeme those, whom he loved, from the enemies tyranny. True it is, that his mother stretching out her hands, besought him that for her sake he would not give over valiantly to assault the place; but that he should be the more encouraged to surprize the fortresse, and to lay hold upon his enemy, and be revenged on the wrong that was offered unto his dearest friends: alleading that she thought it better to die in the midst of a thousand torments, then that the enemy should escape unpunished, who had been so manifest an occasion of their misery. When Hyrcanus heard his mother speak thus, he was more furiously incensed to give the assault: but as soon as he saw his mother so beaten and so sore wounded, his heart melted within him, and the fervent desire which he before had to batter and beat down the City, was presently allayed and cooled; and so the pitifull compassion of his mother, surmounted and overcame his irefull affection of revenge. Whilest thus the siege was continued and prolonged, the year of repose celebrated amongst the Jews was come: For they observed the seventh year, as the seventh day is observed in the week; so that by this occasion Ptolomey was delivered of this siege, who afterwards slew both Hyrcanus mother and brethren: which done he fled unto Zeno surnamed Coryla, who at that time tyrannized in the Citie of the Philadelphians.

CHAP. XVI.

ANTIOCHUS the Devout maketh warre against HIRCANUS, and upon the receipt of three hundred talents, contracteth alliance with him.

ANTIOCHUS calling to minde the manifold losses he had received by Simons means, invaded Jewry in the fourth year of his reign, and in the first of Hircanus government, which was in the hundredth sixty and two Olympiade. And after he had spoiled all the countrey, he locked up Hircanus within the Citie of Jerusalem, which he had besieged with seven camps; yet with no advantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the wals, as in respect of the valour of the Citizens, as also the want of water which he had in his Campe; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of raine, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of April. On the North side also where there is a great Plain, Antiochus caused one hundred towers to be erected every one three stages high, on which he planted certain companies of armed souldiers; who daily fought with the besieged, and who by the means of a double and deep trench, took from them all their commodities. They on the other side made often sallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the enimie on the suddain, they made a great slaughter: but if they were discovered, they rettyred souldier-like. But Hircanus considering the great number of people that were in the Citie, who rather consumed souldiers victuals then performed any service, he divided those that were unfit for warre, and sent them out of the Citie, retaining onely those with him, who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to have free liberty to depart; so that wandring here and there between the wals and the campe, they were consumed with famine, and died miserably. When as therefore the feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affairs, they that were within had compassion of their countymen, and drew them within the wals, and entertained them within the Citie. At this time Hircanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him truce for seven dayes, by reason of the solemnitie of the feast: whereunto he accorded for the honour which he bare unto God: Furthermore, he sent a magnificent sacrifice into Jerusalem of Buls with gilded hornes, and vessels full of divers odors, with other vessels of gold and silver. Those that had the charge of the gates, received the sacrifice at their hands that brought the same, and offered them in the Temple. Antiochus himselfe also gave the souldiers certain meates to grace their feastivall, shewing himselfe herein to be of a far better disposition then Antiochus Epiphanes, who after he had taken the Citie, caused swines flesh to be sacrificed upon the Altar, and besprinkled the Temple with the broth of hogs, making a confusion of the ordinances of the law of God, which was the cause that this nation rebelled and conceived a deadly hatred against him: but Antiochus of whom we spake at this present, was by all men called Devout, because of the incredible affection that he had to the service of God.

Hircanus acknowledging the bountie and affection he had towards God and his sacrifices, sent Embassadors unto him, requiring him that he would permit them to use the ancient policy of their forefathers. Whereupon the King sequestering all those far off from his company, who counsell'd him to destroy the Jewish nation, who lived apart and had no acquaintance with others, made no reckoning of their words. And understanding that all the conversation of the Jews was conformable unto piety, he answered the Embassadors, that if the besieged would yeeld up their arms and pay the tributes of Joppe, and the other Cities that were out of Judaea, and would receive a garrison, such as he should appoint; he would discharge them of this warre. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receive a garrison, lest they should be enforced to entertain such with whom they could not converse; but in stead of the garrison they gave pledges, and paid five hundred talents of silver, of which the King received three hundred in hand, with the pledges, amongst which was Hyrchanus brother: and after he had beaten down the cope and panes of the wall, with the other battlements of defence, he raised the siege and departed. But Hyrchanus opening David's monument (who surpassed all other Kings in riches during his time) drew three thousand talents out of the same: whereby he took occasion first of all among the Jews to entertain a forraign army. There was also a friendship and confederation betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertained in the Citie with all his army, and furnished him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same. And that which is more, Antiochus having enterprized an exploit against the Parthians, Hyrchanus marched also in his company. Nicholus Damascene beareth witnesse hereof, writing after this maner, in his history:

The Idumæans conquered by Hircanus, admit circumcision, and the laws of the Jews.
Hircanus maketh a league with the Romans.

HIRCANUS hearing news of Antiochus death, led forth his army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to finde them disarmed both of garrisons and means of defence, as in effect it came to passe. He therefore took the Citie of Medaba at the end of six moneths, after that his army had suffered many calamities. Afterwards he seized Samoga, and the Cities thereabout: The Cities of Sichem, and Garizim also where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the module of the Temple of Jerusalem (which Alexander the Great permitted Sanaballath to build in favour of his sonne in law Manasses, brother to the high Priest Iaddus, as we have heretofore declared) which Temple was laid desolate two hundred years after it was builded. Hircanus also took certain fortresses & cities of Idumæa, as Adora, and Marissa; and after he had subdued all the Idumæans, he permitted them to inhabit the countrey, under this condition, that they should consent to be circumcised; and to live according to the laws and religion of the Jews. They through the desire they had to live in the place where they were born, submitted themselves to be circumcised, and to live according to the customes and ordinances of the Jews; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Jews.

Whilest thus Hircanus was high Priest, he thought good to renew the amitie betwixt the Jews and the Romans; and to this effect he sent an embassage with letters unto the Senate. As soone as the Senate had received his letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect ensuing: Fannius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the field of Mars the eighth day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the sonne of Dositheus, Apollonius the sonne of Alexander, Diodorus the sonne of Iason, men of good reputation and honour, and sent Embassadors by the people of the Jews, have proposed; who have dealt with us as touching the confederation and amitie that this nation had with the Romans, and have likewise conferred as touching the affairs of estate, namely, that Joppe and the ports thereof, Gazara and the fountains thereunto belonging, and those other cities of the countrey, which Antiochus took from them, contrary to the decree of the Senate, should be restored unto them: and that it may not be lawfull for the Kings souldiers to passe thorow their countrey, neither any of those provinces, that are under their government: and that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this warre, contrary to the arrest and decree of the Senate, should be declared void, to the end that the Embassadors sent in the Senates behalfe, may provide for the restitution of those things, which Antiochus hath spoiled them of, and may rate and set down the damages, which the countrey hath received by this warre. Item, that commendatory letters should be written in the behalfe of the Jewish Embassadors, to the Kings and free people for their secure and safe return into their countrey. It hath been held convenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and confederation with men of so good respect, sent unto them by a nation so good and faithfull towards them. And as touching the letters, the answer was, that they should be written, at such time as the affairs of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward, they would have care that no injury should be offered them. And the Pretor Fannius was commanded also to deliver the Embassadors money out of the common purse, to beare their charges home into their countrey: and thus did Fannius dismiss the Embassadors of the Jews, after he had given them silver out of the common treasure, with the decree of the Senate addressed to those that should conduct them, and give them assured convoy to return into their countrey. And this was the estate of the affairs during Hircanus Priesthood.

But

A But King Demetrius being sharply whetted to make warre against Hircanus, could have neither time nor occasion to exploit the same, by reason that both the Syrians and his men of warre were scarcely well affected toward him, because of his wickednesse of life. For they sent Embassadours to Ptolomey, surnamed Physcon, to require him to send some one of Selencus race unto them, to take upon him the kingdome. Whereupon Ptolomey sent them Alexander surnamed Zebina, accompanied with an army; who waging battell with Demetrius, put him to the worst, and constrained him to flie to his wife Cleopatra to Ptolemais: who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was constrained to retire himselfe from thence unto Tyre; where he was taken, and after he had suffered many miseries by the hands of his enemies, he finally died. Alexander having by this means obtained the kingdome, made a league of amitie with Hircanus. And whereas it so fell out, that Antiochus, surnamed Gryphus, the sonne of Demetrius made warre against him, he was overcome and slain in the battell. When as therefore Antiochus had taken possession of the kingdome of Syria, he forbore to make warre against the Jews, for that he had intelligence that his bother by the mothers side (who was in like sort named Antiochus) assembled an army against him at Cyzicus. Remaining therefore in his countrey, he resolved to make preparation against his brothers coming, who was called Cyzicenus, because he was brought up in that citie, and was the sonne of Antiochus called the Conserver, who died in the countrey of the Parthians, and who was brother to Demetrius the father of Gryphus: and it so fell out, that both these brothers were married to one and the same Cleopatra, as we have heretofore exprest. When Antiochus the Cyzicenus was arrived in Syria, he made warre against his brother, which continued many yeeres:

C during all which time Hircanus lived in peace (for presently after Antiochus death, he revolted from the subjection of the Macedonians) and from that time forward gave them no succours, neither as subject, neither as friend; but his fortunes both augmented and flourished greatly during the time of Alexander Zebina; and principally during the reign of these two brothers. For the war, wherein they consumed one another, gave Hircanus an opportunitie, to levy all the revenews of Judæa, without any contradiction: so that by the same means he gathered infinite sums of money. For whilest the Cyzicenus destroyed his brothers countrey, Hircanus also made known his inclination and disposition: and seeing likewise that, Antiochus was destitute of those succours he expected out of Egypt, and that both himselfe and his brother also (through their naturall discords) weakened one anothers estates, he set as

CHAP. XVIII.

How ANTIOCHUS the Cyzicenus came to the reliefe of the Samaritans: and how being conquered, he fled away.

FOR which cause he drew forth his army against Samaria (which was a strong citie) and is at this day called Sebastia, because it was reedified by Herod, as we will make manifest in time and place convenient. He therefore began to besiege and batter the same with all diligence; animated thereunto, because of the extreme hate he bare the Samaritans, in that onely to please the Kings of Syria they had offered many grievous outrages to the Marissens, who were extracted from, & allied with the Jews. He therefore made a trench round about the Citie, with a double wall of eighty foulds, and committed the generall command of this siege to his sonnes Antigonus and Aristobulus, who so diligently and valiantly behaved themselves, that the Samaritans being overpressed with extreme famine, were constrained to eate such things as were unusefull and unaccustomed amongst men; and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenus to their rescous. Who readily repaired thither, but was repulsed by Aristobulus souldiers, and being pursued by the two brethren as farre as Scythopolis, he hardly escaped; and they returning to their siege, freshly assaulted and besieged the Samaritans within their own wals: So that once more they were constrained to send Embassadours to Antiochus for aide, who was their allie; who sent unto Ptolomey Lathyrus for about some six thousand men of warre, who furnished him with them contrary to his mothers minde, who therefore had almost thrust him out of his dominion. As soon as he had received them, he made a road into Hircanus countrey, and spoiled and foraged the same as farre as Egypt. For he durst not bid him battell hand to hand, because he had not competent forces; but thought that in spoiling the countrey he might cause them to levy the siege, and forsake Samaria: but after he had lost a great number of his men by divers ambuscadoes of his enemies, he went unto Tripoly, committing the the generall charge of that warre to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. The Cal- limander more rashly then wisely attempting to set upon the enemy, was himselfe slain, and his souldiers discomfited. And Epicrates given over to covetousnesse, did openly yeeld up Scythopolis and other Cities into the hands of the Jews: so that it was impossible for either of them to levy the siege. Finally, after that Hircanus had continued his siege before the City for the space of one whole year, he became master of the same: and not contenting himselfe with the surprizall hereof, he utterly destroyed it, enforcing the rivers thorow the midst thereof; yea he ruined the same in such sort, that the mud and soile both of the water and earth took away all the appearance of the Citie; so that it seemed as if it had never been. Of this Hircanus there is a certain incredible matter committed to memory, namely, how during his high Priesthood God had conference with him. For it is reported, that the very same day wherein his sonnes fought against Antiochus the Cyzicenean, whilest being himselfe alone, he offered incense in the Temple, that he heard a voice, saying, that his two sonnes had at that present overcome Antiochus: all which he incontinently signified unto the people at the gate of the Temple; and according as he had said, so it came to passe.

See here what occurrences hapned in Hircanus time.

About this very instant likewise, the affairs of the Jews prospered not onely in Jerusalem and Judæa, but also amongst the inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally in Egypt and Cyprus.
For Queen Cleopatra rebelling against her sonne Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias the sonnes of that Onias, who had builded the Temple in Heliopolis (according to the pattern of that in Jerusalem) her chieftains. And having committed her army unto their hands, she acted nothing without their advice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witnesseth, speaking after this maner: Divers of those who came with us, and of those who had been sent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, suddenly revolted to Ptolomey: Onely the Jews that were of Onias faction, remained constant in their dutie, because the Queen made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their countermen. Thus far Strabo. This great felicity and prosperity of Hircanus moved the Jews to conceive a hatred against him, and especially the Pharisees opposed themselves against him. These Pharisees were one of the sects of the Jews (whereof we have heretofore intreated) which sect was so great in credit with the common people, that when they deposed any thing, were it against the King or the Priest, they were presently beleevd. Hircanus had been one of their disciples, and was in like sort very much beleevd of them. He therefore invited them to a feast, and entertained them with all humanity: and seeing that they were set upon a merry pin, he began to tell them that they knew his minde, how that he desired nothing more then to be just, and to square all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themselves taught. He therefore required them, that if they perceived that he mistook himselfe in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redresse the same.
Whereupon all of them gave testimony of his perfect vertue. Wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and such a one as delighted in mutiny, said unto him: Since you desire to heare the truth, if so be you affect the estimation of a good man, give over the place of Priesthood, and content your selfe with the government of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cause wherefore he should forsake the Priesthood? Because (saith he) that we have heard say by our ancestors, that your mother was a captive during the reign of Antiochus the Famous (which notwithstanding was a false report.) Hircanus hearing this, was sore moved against him, and also all other of the Pharisees, who were assistant in that place. Amongst the rest there was a certain man called Zonathan, of the the order of the Sadduces (who maintain an opposite opinion against the Pharisees) who was an inward and deare friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the injuriously speeches that Eleazar had spoken by him, who told him that (as he thought) Elee- zar had spoken these words by the publike consent of the Pharisees; and that he might discover the same most manifestly, if he enquired of them what punishment Eleazar had deserved for speaking after this sort. Hircanus therefore questioned with the Pharisees as concerning his punishment, telling them that he should very well perceive, that this injury had not been pronounced by the common consent of them all, if they condemned the offender to suffer a punishment proportionable to his offence. Whereupon they decreed, that he ought to be punished by imprisonment and scourging, for (said they) an injury done in word, required no capitall punishment: and to speak uprightly, they in their thinking censured severely enough of this fault, for that the Pharisees are naturally inclined to mercy when there groweth any question of punishment. But Hircanus was sore offended with this their answer, and imagined

A imagined that this Eleazar had spoken after this maner by the common instigation of the rest. This displeasure and conceived dislike of his, did Jonathan aggravate to the uttermost, and handled the matter in such sort, that he drew Hircanus to forsake the Pharises, and to subscribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, abolishing their ordinances, and causing them to be sharply punished that observe the same. These practices of Hircanus incensed the people against him and his sonnes. But hereof we will speak in another place. At this present I will declare how the Pharises have made many ordinances among the people, according to the tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the laws of Moses: for which cause the Sect of the Sadduces rejecteth them, affirming that they ought to keep the written ordinances, & not to observe those that are grounded upon the tradition of the fathers: And great dispute and dissensions have been raised among them upon this occasion, because the richer sort onely, and not the baser sort of people, cleaved to the Sadduces: but the Pharises had the commonaltie on their sides. But of these two sorts, and of the Essenes, I have more exactly entreated in my second book of the warres of the Jews. But Hircanus finally appeased this mutiny, and lived afterwards in much peace and happinesse, and after he had most discreetly governed his Princedome for the space of one and thirty years; he died, leaving five sons behind him. This man was honoured by God with three great gifts; the gift of government, the gift of Priesthood, and the gift of prophecie. For God spake unto him divers times by Oracles, and Revelations, and gave him the knowledge of things to come; which he in such sort foretold, that he declared that his two eldest sonnes should not possesse the principality any long time: whose end it shall not be amisse to set down in what maner it was, to the intent that the prophecy of their father may be the better known.

ARISTOBULUS obtaineth the government, and first of all placeth the Kingly Diadem on his head.

AFTER the death of their father, Aristobulus the eldest of his sonnes determined to exchange the principality into an absolute estate of a kingdome: and the better to attain thereunto, he first of all set the Diadem upon his head, foure hundred eighty and one years and three moneths since the people of the Jews were delivered from the servitude of Babylon, and led again into their countrey. And for that Aristobulus amongst all his other brethren, loved Antigonus best of all, who was the neereest unto him in age, he accepted him as a companion in the government of the Kingdome: but as touching the rest, he shut them up in prison. He locked up his mother likewise, who had consented with him as concerning the government (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her disposition) and so farre extended his crueltie, that he famished her to death in prison. After he had thus handled his mother, he slew his brother Antigonus also; whom he pretended to love above all the rest, and whom (as he made shew) he had made partner of his kingdome. From whom he estranged himselfe, by reason of some slanders and false accusations raised up against him; which at the first he gave no credit to, both for that the friendship which he bare unto him, made him slightly respect the same, as also for that he imagined that he was enviously slandered. It came to passe that Antigonus, returning upon a certain time from the army with great magnificence, about the time of the feast of Tabernacles, chanced to repaire thither at that very time, wherein Aristobulus hapned to fall sick. Antigonus intending to celebrate the solemnity, ascended the Temple in great bravery, attended by some of his army, to make his speciall prayers for his brothers health. Whereupon certain malicious wretches, desirous to break the concord that was between them, made use of this occasion, and of Antigonus magnificent pompe and good fortune; and came unto the King, amplifying unto him in malicious words, what pompe and majesty he had shewed in that solemnity, telling him that in these his actions, he demeaned himselfe in no sort like a private man; but that all his actions were levelled at a royaltie: finally, that his intent was to enter the kingdome by force, and to kill him, in that he made his account that since he might be King alone, it was a great simplicitie for him to have a companion. But Aristobulus, although he would very hardly to be induced to beleieve these reports; yet notwithstanding being desirous both to extinguish the suspicion, and to provide for his own securitie, he disposed certain of his guard in a dark and privie place under ground, and lodged himselfe in a certain tower called Antonia, commanding that no man should offer violence, except to those who entred armed: Giving a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entred armed, he should be slain. Which done, he sent for his brother, willing him to repaire unto him without weapons. Which when the Queen and they that plotted the murder of Antigonus understood, they perswaded the messenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that he made warlike preparation and furniture for warre) that in that estate and pompe, and in those royall and warlike accoutrements, he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an eye-witnesse of his brave furniture and preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harme intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foot toward Aristobulus, to shew himselfe in that bravery: and when he came right over against the tower, that is called Straton, where the passage was very dark, the Kings guard slew him.

By this accident a man may easily conjecture, that there is scarcely any power greater then that of envy and slander, and that there is not any thing that may sooner break off the good will and amitie amonst brethren, then these two passions. And above all, there is an occasion offered us of great wonder, in respect of one that was called Judas, of the Sect of the Essens, who in all those things that he prophesied, varied in no sort from the truth: He seeing Antigonus come up into the Temple, cried out among his disciples (who frequented with him to be instructed by him in the method of prophecy) that he was weary of his life, because Antigonus securitie argued the vanitie of his prophecy, by which he had foretold, that that very day he should be slain at Stratons tower; whereas the place where he should be murdered, was six hundreth foulds off, and the better part of the day was already spent: so that it could not be imagined, but that he should be in danger to have made a false prediction. Whilest he declared his doubts after this maner, and was wholly overcome with choler, news was brought that Antigonus was slain in a certain place under ground, which was called the tower of Straton, of the same name with that other that standeth neer the Sea, which was afterwards called Cæsarea; which ambiguitie troubled the Diviner. Incontinently after this accident, Aristobulus repented himselfe, in that he had put his brother to death; and this repentance of his, was seconded by a most grievous sicknesse, proceeding from the affliction of his spirit and detestation of that cruell murder: so that with grievous agony and torment he vomited bloud, as if all his entrals had been torn in sunder. This bloud so vomited by him, it fortun'd (in mine opinion) by the divine providence of God, that a certain servant of his bearing it from his presence, by some trip of his foot hapned to stumble, and shed the same in that very place, which had been soiled with the bloud of the slaughtered Antigonus. By which means they that beheld the same, raised a great cry, exclaiming that the Page had shed the bloud in a convenient place. Aristobulus hearing this out-cry, demanded the cause thereof, and for that no man address'd himselfe to satisfie him, he was the more earnest to know it (according to the nature of men, who are alwaies more suspicious and desirous to know those things, which are most concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, and never a man for feare of him durst tell him the truth. Whereupon he altogether dismayed and affrighted in his conscience, casting forth abundant tears, and loaden with grievous sighes, began to cry out in this maner: How then? Mine impious and detestable act is not hidden from God, but the sudden punishment of my brothers murder pursueth me: wherefore, O thou shamelesse body of mine, how long wilt thou detain my soule, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghosts of my mother and brother? Why dost thou not take it all at once such as it is, without expecting that I should sacrifice my blood, powred out so many times to those, whom I have so traiterously slain? While he pronounced these words, he died, after he had reigned one yeer. He was called Phellesses, that is to say, a lover of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his country many waies, & subdued the Itureans, and joyned the greater part of the country, to Judaea; and had constrained them likewise, who should remain in that country, to be circumcised, and to live according to the laws of the Jews, he died thus miserably. He was by nature courteous and shamefast, as Strabo testifieth, speaking after this maner, by the authoritie of Timagines; This was a courteous man, and profitable to his countymen the Jews in many things: for he enlarged their country, and conquered a part of the nations of the Itureans, whom he tied unto him by the bond of circumcision.

WHEN Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greeks called Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty (whom, as we have heretofore declared, he had shut up prisoners) and made Jannæus (who was called Alexander) King; who both in age and modestie surpassed all the other brethren; but such mis-hap had he, that from his birth-day upward, his father had conceived so great a hate against him, that he never admitted him to his presence so long as he lived. The cause whereof (as it is reported) was this: When as Hircanus loved Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sonnes, with most intire affection, God appeared unto him in his sleep, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeed him? Whereupon God presented unto his sight the semblance of Alexander: wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceived he should be heire of all his goods; and so much prevailed displeasure with him, that as soon as he was born, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee, to be nourished and brought up in that place. But God hath apparantly proved that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the Kingdome, caused one of his two brethren to be put to death, who affected and laboured to make himselfe King: and as for the other, who resolved himselfe to live in idlenesse and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

Zoilus tyrant of Straton and Dora.

After that he had established his estate, according as he thought it most expedient, he led forth his army against Ptolemais: and having obtained the upper hand in the battell, he couped up the men within their citie, and afterwards besieged and entrenched about the same. For amongst all the cities of the sea-coast, these two onely, namely Ptolemais and Gaza remained as yet unconquered; and there was no opposite left but Zoilus, who was seized of the tower of Straton and Dora where he governed. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cizicenus were thus at debate and warre the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were travelled with this siege, Zoilus (who held the tower of Straton and Dora) assisted them with that army he had under him, and gave them some succours, by reason that (since these two Kings were whetted with intestine troubles and warres) he cast how to advance himselfe to the crown and soveraigntie. For these two Kings seemed to neglect their own dangers, resembling herein those wraстlers, who though being wearied with fight; yet are ashamed to submit unto their adversary, but give themselves a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to encounter. The onely hopes they had, were in the Kings of Egypt and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Ile of Cyprus at that time (whither he retired himselfe after he had been driven out of his kingdome by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolemaidans sent Embassadors as unto their allie, requiring him to come and deliver them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These Embassadors perswaded him, that if he would passe into Syria, he should have both Zoilus to friend, and those of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolemaidans: and moreover, they assured him that the Sidonians and divers others would second him: and by this means so encouraged him with promises, that he hastened himselfe to set saile.

But in the mean space Demenetus (who was both eloquent and in great authoritie with the Citizens) made the Ptolemaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazard themselves in some uncertain danger, wherewith the Jews threatened them, then to deliver themselves into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest servitude. And moreover, not onely to sustain a present warre; but that which is more, an imminent warre from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should levy an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce her selfe also to thrust her sonne out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey, if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more return again to Cyprus; whereas they were to expect no lesse but extreme danger. Now although that Ptolomey being at sea, understood how the Ptolemaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foot and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolemais; and perceiving that upon his encamping, they of the city admitted not his Embassadors, neither in any sort gave eare unto them, he was wondrously perplexed. But after Zoilus and they of Gaza were come unto him, requiring him him to yeeld their assistance, for that their countrey was destroyed by the Jews, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolemais; for feare of Ptolomey, and retiring his army into his own countrey, he began to use this stratagem. For covertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; and openly he made a shew of amitie and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to give him foure hundred talents of silver, provided that he would deliver him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assigne those possessions held by him unto the Jews. Ptolomey having made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he understood that Alexander had sent and incensed his mother against him, he brake all accord, and went & besieged Ptolemais, that would not entertain him. After therefore he had left his lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces he departed with the rest, to enter upon and spoile the countrey of Judaea. Alexander perceiving Ptolomeys intent, assembled about 50000. fighting men of his own countrey, (or as some historians have written, 80000) with whom he went out to fight against Ptolomey, who suddenly setting upon Azoch a city of Galilee on a Sabbath day, took it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantitie of other booty.

Afterwards set upon Sephor a citie neer unto Azoch, from whence he departed with the losse of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make head against him, and met with him neer unto Jordan, in a place called Afophon, and encamped right over against the enemy. He had in his vanguard 8000. men, whom he called combattants by the hundredths, who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomeys foreward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceiving themselves to be inferiours in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazard battell. But Philostephanus the camp-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to passe the flood, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the river on their backs, he should be the more assured of them, that they should not warrantize themselves from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought, with answerable valour, so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiving that Alexanders army had the better, he took a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselves. The wing of the Jews vanguard that saw themselves freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to flie; and so far were those that marched next them, from yeelding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became partners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomeys side behaved themselves farre otherwise: for they pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarraied them, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their arms with killing them. It is reported that thirty thousand men were slain in the battell (Timagenes saith, fifty thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and other some fled unto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, he overranne and spoiled the whole countrey, and in the evening he quartered himselfe in certain villages of Judaea, which he found full of women and children, and commanded his souldiers without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into pieces; and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were well sod, to eat the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battell, and retired to their own habitations, should know that their enemies would eat mens flesh; that by this means they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselves after this maner, as I have declared. And Ptolomey took Ptolemais also by force, as I have made known else-where.

But Cleopatra perceiving how her sonne prospered, and how he had spoyled Jewry without any prejudice, and subjected the Citie of Gaza to his command: she concluded with her selfe, that she ought not to suffer him to increase after that maner, considering it was upon the borders of Egypt, whose soveraigntie he affected. For which cause, she suddenly marched out against him, with an army both by sea and land; committing the command of her whole forces to Chelcias & Ananias, both Jews; and sent the greater part of her riches into the Ile of Coos, with her nephews, and her testament, to be reserved and kept there in safety.

A safety. And after she had commanded her sonne Alexander to set sail toward Phœnicia, with a great navy, because the inhabitants of that countrey were revolted from her obeisance: she her self departed and came to Ptolemais, and besieged it, when she perceived that they refused to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haste to depart out of Syria, and to enter Ægypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he should finde the countrey disurnished of men of warre. But this purpose failed him. At that time it fortun'd, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatras armie, died in Coelosyria, being in pursuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra having tydings of her sonnes enterprise, and that the successe and fortune he expected in Ægypt had failed him, she sent part of her armie to drive him out of the countrey, so that he was enforced to return back again out of Ægypt, and to go and spend his winter at Gaza. Mean while Cleopatra besieged and took the citie of Ptolemais, whither Alexander resorted
 B unto her, with great presents, and an answerable respect unto his fortune, who had been so untowardly handled by Ptolomey, having now no other recourse left him but to her favour and assistance. Upon his arrivall, certain of her familiars counselled her to lay hands on him, and to seize the countrey: and not to permit that so great a number of Jews, and they so valiant men, should become subjects unto one man. But Ananias gave her counsell to the contrary, alleading that she should commit an act of great injustice, if she should depose him, who was her allie, from the government; who was beside that, very neerly allied unto her. For (said he) I would you should know, that by committing this wrong, you shall raise in all the rest of the Jews a hainous hatred against you. Cleopatra conforming her self according to
 C Ananias counsell, resolv'd with her self to offer Alexander no injurie, but in stead thereof, she entertained him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a citie of Coelosyria. Now when Alexander perceived, that he was discharged of the fear which he had conceived in respect of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his army into Coelosyria, and after six moneths siege, took Gadara: he took shortly after Amath also (which is a great fortresse belonging to the inhabitants about Jordan) where Theodore the sonne of Zenon had hoorded up the richest and goodliest part of his substance: who surprising the Jews at unawares, slew about ten thousand of them, and pillaged Alexanders baggage.

This did not any wayes astonish Alexander: but notwithstanding the dyfaster, he marched forward toward the cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, situate on the sea-coasts, and took them perforce; and seeing that Ptolomey was retired from D Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Ægypt, he besieged the citie of Gaza, and spoiled all the countrey round about it, by reason of the displeasure which he had conceived against the citizens, for that they had sought their assistance at Ptolomeys hands against him. Against him Apollodorus Captain of the Gazeans made a sally by night, and entered the camp of the Jews, having onely with him two thousand strange souldiers, and one thousand of his own followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazeans had the upper hand, because that they made their enemies beleve that Ptolomey was come to their rescue, and to assault the Jews afresh: but as soon as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soon as the Jews were assured of the truth, they turned back upon them, and charging the Gazeans, they slew about some one thousand fighting men of them.

Alexander besiegeth Gaza. Apollodorus by night invadeth the camp of the Jews.

E All this notwithstanding, they bethought them on no surrender, but stood out, being neither amated with losse of men, or lack of provision whatsoever, resolving themselves rather to endure any misery, then to submit themselves into the hands of their enemies: and that which made them more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas King of Arabia, who had promised no lesse. But it came to passe that Apollodorus was slain before his arrivall, and the citie taken. For Lyfimachus his brother conceived a jealousie against him, by reason of the good opinion which the inhabitants had of him, and having slain him, and gathered those fighting men that he might, he yeelded up the citie unto Alexander, who at the first made a peaceable entrie, but afterwards disperd his souldiers, and gave
 F them licence to execute all hostilitie against the citizens: so that they acted their crueltie in every place, and slew many of the Gazeans: Neither died these citizens unrevenge'd, but so manfully behaved they themselves, that they butchered no lesse number of Jews, then they murdered citizens among them. Some of them likewise perceiving themselves to be alone, set fire upon their houses, taking away first that which was therein, to the intent that the enemy might be enriched with none of their spoils. Other some killed their wives and children with their own hands, meaning this way to deliver them from the enemies servitude. But the Senators, to the number of five hundreth, were fled into the Temple of Apollo (for at such time as the enemy entred the town, they were by chance assembled in counsell) all these did Alexander put to the sword, and instantly razed and levelled that Citie with the ground:

ground: which done, he returned to Jerusalem, after he had spent one whole yeer at the G

About this time Antiochus, surnamed Gryphus, died by the treason of Heraclion, in the fourty and fifth yeer of his age, and in the nine and twentieth of his reign. His sonne Seleucus had the kingdome after him, who made warre against his uncle Antiochus, surnamed Cyzicenus, and having overcome and taken him, he slew him. Not long after, Antiochus the sonne of Cyzicenus, and Antoninus, surnamed the Devout, came to Arade, and placed the Diadems upon their heads, and made warre against Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and drave him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriving again in the citie of the Mopseates, he exacted a summe of money at the citizens hands. But the people were so incensed, that they set fire on his palace; whereby it came to passe, that both he and his friends H were burned to dust. During the time that Antiochus the sonne of Cyzicenus reigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made warre against him; but he was not onely overcome, but both he and his army were put to the sword. After him, Philip his sonne took the Diadem, and governed in certain places of Syria.

Mean while Ptolomey Lathurus sent to Gnidus for his fourth brother Demetrius Eucerus, and made him King of Damasco. Against these two brothers Antiochus made a manly and valiant resistance, but died very shortly after. For repairing to Laodicea to succour the Queen of the Galadenians, who made warre against the Parthians, he died fighting valiantly; and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip possessed Syria, as hereafter shall be declared. As for Alexander, a domesticall sedition was raised against him, for the people arose and mutined at such time, as he assisted at the Altar to solemnize the feast of Tabernacles, and during the time that he intended the sacrifice, they cast Citrons at him: for (as we have declared elsewhere)
the Jews have this custome, that on the feast of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palm, and of Citrons. They upbraided him also with many injurious speeches, reproach-
ing him, that he had been prisoner in warre; and that he was also unworthy of the honour of the Priesthood. Whereupon, he being moved by these disgraces, slaughtered about six thousand men: and having made an inclosure of wood about the Temple and the Altar (as farre as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Priests) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained also certain strange souldiers Pisidians and Cilicians. For in that he was at oddes with the Syrians, he made no use of them. K

After this, having overcome the Arabians, he constrained the Moabites and Galaadites to pay him tribute, and destroyed the Citie of Amath whilest Theodore for fear gave over to resist him. But encountering with Obeda the King of Arabia, and being surprised and betrayed by an ambuscado in certain miry and unhaunted places, he was thrust by the presse of the camels into a deep trench (neer unto Gadara a village of Galaad) from whence he almost despaired to escape: notwithstanding, avoiding that danger, he came to Jerusalem. And besides this his last mishap, the people hated him, against whom he made warre for the space of six yeers, and slew at the least fiftie thousand of them: and the more he intreated them to compromit these hainous debates between them, the more grievous displeasure conceived
they against him, because of the inconveniences they had suffered: so that when he demanded of them what they would have him to do, they all of them with one voice cried out, that he should kill himself. And thereupon they presently sent messengers to Demetrius Eucerus, requesting him of his favour and assistance. L

DEMETRIUS EUCERUS overcometh ALEXANDER in battell.

WHEN coming onward with his army, and taking with him those who had incited him to the enterprise, came and encamped neer unto the citie of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together some twenty thousand Jews (whom he knew to be well affected towards him) with six thousand and two hundred mercenary sould-diers and strangers, marched forward against Demetrius, who led with him three thousand horsemen, and fourtie thousand footmen. Both on the one and the other side there fell out many subtill stratagems: the one of them striving on the one side to inveigle and withdraw the forrain souldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himself to reconcile those Jews that were of Demetrius followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other prevailed ought at all by these devices; so that finally they were driven to decide their quarrell by the sword: in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand. For all the strangers that were on Alexanders side, were every one hewed in pieces, after they had made sufficient proof both of their faith and valour. There died also many of Demetrius souldiers.
But

A But after that Alexander had fled unto the mountains, divers Jews (to the number of six thousand) in commiseration of his desperate estate, and through the fear they had of Demetrius, resorted unto him; which when the Conqueror heard, he retired himself. After this, the Jews made warre against Alexander, and in divers losses which they received, there died a great number of them in divers combats: Finally, after he had closed up the most strongest amongst them in the citie of Bethon, he besieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them under his subjection, he carried them to Jerusalem, where he perpetrated an unspeakable and cruell murder. For whilest he banquetted with his concubines, in the sight of them all, he commanded eight hundred of them or thereabout to be crucified, and before their eyes whilest they yet lived, he caused their wives and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to revenge himself of those wrongs which he had received: but he exceeded the bounds of humanity herein, notwithstanding they had rebelled against him; and reduced him into a most pitious estate, and put him in danger both of his life and kingdom. For being not content to assaile and make warre upon him with their forces, they drew strangers also in his countrey against him: and finally, they overpressed him in such sort, that he was constrained to yeeld up into the King of Arabias hands, the countries and cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for fear lest they should joyn with the Jews, and make warre against him; besides other innumerable injuries and outrages committed by them against him. This notwithstanding it cannot be excused, but that he overshoot himself herein; so that by reason of this enormous crueltie, he was called Thracidas, that is to say, as cruell as a Thracian: and this title continued amongst the Jews. The souldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thousand, fled by night into strong and sure holds; and as long as Alexander lived, they were in exile. But at the last, after he was delivered of all these troubles, he lived in quiet, and governed his kingdom peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing from Judea to Bercea, besieged his brother Philip with ten thousand footmen, and one thousand horse. But Sirason Lord of Bercea, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces governour of the Parthians, unto his help, who repairing unto him with great forces, besieged Demetrius in his own trenches, in which they so inclosed him by continuall shooting of darts, and want of water, that they constrained him, and those that were with him, to submit themselves to their mercy. When as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were seized of Demetrius, they sent him prisoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the camp, were suffered to depart with the safety of their lives and baggage, and to return to Antioch. But Mithridates King of Parthia honoured Demetrius, by all means possible, untill such time as he was surprisid with a sicknesse, whereof he died. Incontinently after the battell, Philip came into Antioch, and having obtained the kingdom, ruled over Syria.

The exploits of ANTIOCHUS DIONYSIUS against Judea.

AFTER this, Antiochus called Dionysius (who was Philip's brother) came into Damasco to obtain the soveraigntie therein, and therein in short space accomplishing his affairs, got possession of the crown. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readinesse to invade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damasco with great speed, and made him surrender up the Citie, both by the means of Milesius whom Antiochus had left governour in the Castle; as also by the consent of the citizens themselves. But Philip shewed himself ungratefull toward Milesius, performing nothing of that which he had promised him, at such time as he delivered him the Citie; because his intent was, that the world should think that the fear of his power, and not Milesius's favour, was the cause of the surprisall of Damasco. Which act of his drew him into suspicion with Milesius, and was the cause that he lost the city again. For departing from thence to exercise himself at tilt, Milesius lockt the gates against him, and kept the city for Antiochus. Who having intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very instant led his army into Judea, in which there were eight thousand footmen, and eight hundred horsemen. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deep trench from Caparba (which is called at this day Antipatris) as farre as the sea of Joppe (which was the onely streight whereby he might be assailed) and made a wall furnished with wooden towers, with their courts of guard, distant the one from the other an hundred and fiftie furlongs, entred armed: Giving a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entred armed, he should be slain. Which done, he sent for his brother, willing him to repaire unto him without weapons. Which when the Queen and they that complotted the murder of Antigonus understood, they perswaded the messenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that he made warlike preparation and furniture for warre) that in that estate and pompe, and in those royall and warlike accoutrements, he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an eye-witnesse of his brave furniture and preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harme intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foot toward Aristobulus, to shew himselfe in that bravery: and when he came right over against the tower, that is called Straton, where the passage was very dark, the Kings guard slew him.

By this accident a man may easily conjecture, that there is scarcely any power greater then that of envy and slander, and that there is not any thing that may sooner break off the good will and amitie amongst brethren, then these two passions. And above all, there is an occasion offered us of great wonder, in respect of one that was called Judas, of the Sect of the Essens, who in all those things that he prophesied, varied in no sort from the truth. He seeing Antigonus come up into the Temple, cried out among his disciples (who frequented with him to be instructed by him in the method of prophecy) that he was weary of his life, because Antigonus securitie argued the vanitie of his prophecy, by which he had foretold, that that very day he should be slain at Stratons tower; whereas the place where he should be murdered, was six hundreth foulds off, and the better part of the day was already spent: so that it could not be imagined, but that he should be in danger to have made a false prediction. Whilest he declared his doubts after this maner, and was wholly overcome with choler, news was brought that Antigonus was slain in a certain place under ground, which was called the tower of Straton, of the same name with that other that standeth neer the Sea, which was afterwards called Casarea; which ambiguitie troubled the Diviner. Incontinently after this accident, Aristobulus repented himselfe, in that he had put his brother to death; and this repentance of his, was seconded by a most grievous sicknesse, proceeding from the affliction of his spirit and detestation of that cruell murder: so that with grievous agony and torment he vomited blood, as if all his entrails had been torn in funder. This blood so vomited by him, it fortun'd (in mine opinion) by the divine providence of God, that a certain servant of his bearing it from his presence, by some trip of his foot hapned to stumble, and shed the same in that very place, which had been soiled with the blood of the slaughtered Antigonus. By which means they that beheld the same, raised a great cry, exclaiming that the Page had shed the blood in a convenient place. Aristobulus hearing this out-cry, demanded the cause thereof, and for that no man address'd himselfe to satisfie him, he was the more earnest to know it (according to the nature of men, who are alwaies more suspicious and desirous to know those things, which are most concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, and never a man for feare of him durst tell him the truth. Whereupon he altogether dismayed and affrighted in his conscience, casting forth abundant tears, and laden with grievous sighes, began to cry out in this maner: How then? Mine impious and detestable act is not hidden from God, but the sudden punishment of my brothers murder pursueth me: wherefore, O thou shamelesse body of mine, how long wilt thou detain my soule, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghosts of my mother and brother? Why dost thou not take it all at once such as it is, without expecting that I should sacrifice my blood, poured out so many times to those, whom I have so traiterously slain? While he pronounced these words, he died, after he had reigned one year. He was called Philles, that is to say, a lover of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his country many waies, & subdued the Itureans, and joyned the greater part of the country, to Judaea; and had constrained them likewise, who should remain in that country, to be circumcised, and to live according to the laws of the Jews, he died thus miserably. He was by nature courteous and shamefast, as Strabo testifieth, speaking after this maner, by the authoritie of Timagines; This was a courteous man, and profitable to his countymen the Jews in many things: for he enlarged their country, and conquered a part of the nations of the Itureans, whom he tied unto him by the bond of circumcision.

CHAP. XX.

The exploits of ALEXANDER King of the Jews.

WHEN Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greeks called Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty (whom, as we have heretofore declared, he had shut up prisoners) and made Jannaeus (who was called Alexander) King, who both in age and modestie surpassed all the other brethren, but such mis-hap had he, that from his birth-day upward, his father had conceived so great a hate against him, that he never admitted him to his presence so long as he lived. The cause whereof (as it is reported) was this: When as Hircanus loved Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sonnes, with most intire affection, God appeared unto him in his sleep, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeed him? Whereupon God presented unto his sight the semblance of Alexander: wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceived he should be heire of all his goods; and so much prevailed displeasure with him, that as soon as he was born, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee, to be nourished and brought up in that place. But God hath apparantly proved that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the Kingdome, caused one of his two brethren to be put to death, who affected and laboured to make himselfe King: and as for the other, who resolved himselfe to live in idleness and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

After that he had established his estate, according as he thought it most expedient, he led forth his army against Ptolemais: and having obtained the upper hand in the battell, he couped up the men within their citie, and afterwards besieged and entrenched about the same. For amongst all the cities of the sea-coast, these two onely, namely Ptolemais and Gaza remained as yet unconquered, and there was no opposer left but Zoilus, who was seized of the tower of Straton and Dora where he governed. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cizicenus were thus at debate and were the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were travelled with this siege, Zoilus (who held the tower of Straton and Dora) assisted them with that army he had under him, and gave them some succours, by reason that (since these two Kings were whetted with intestine troubles and warres) he cast how to advance himselfe to the crown and soveraigntie. For these two Kings seemed to neglect their own dangers, resembling herein those warrlers, who though being wearied with fight, yet are ashamed to submit unto their adversary, but give themselves a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to encounter. The onely hopes they had, were in the Kings of Egypt, and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Ile of Cyprus at that time (whither he retired himselfe after he had been driven out of his kingdome by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolemaidans sent Embassadors as unto their allie, requiring him to come and deliver them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These Embassadors perswaded him, that if he would passe into Syria, he should have both Zoilus to friend, and those of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolemaidans: and moreover, they assured him that the Sidonians and divers others would second him: and by this means so encouraged him with promises, that he hasted himselfe to set saile.

But in the mean space Demetrius (who was both eloquent and in great authoritie with the Citizens) made the Ptolemaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazard themselves in some uncertain danger, wherewith the Jews threatened them, then to deliver themselves into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest servitude. And moreover, not onely to sustain a present warre; but that which is more, an imminent warre from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should levy an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce her selfe also to thrust her sonne out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey, if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more return again to Cyprus, whereas they were to expect no lesse but extreme danger. Now although that Ptolomey being at sea, understood how the Ptolemaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foot and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolemais; and perceiving that upon his encamping, they of the city admitted not his Embassadors, neither in any sort gave eare unto them, he was wondrously perplexed. But after Zoilus and they of Gaza were come unto him, requiring him

him to yeeld their assistance, for that their countrey was destroyed by the Jews, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolemais; for feare of Ptolomey, and retiring his army into his own countrey, he began to use this stratagem. For covertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; and openly he made a shew of amitie and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to give him foure hundred talents of silver, provided that he would deliver him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assigne those possessions held by him unto the Jews. Ptolomey having made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he understood that Alexander had sent and incensed his mother against him, he brake all accord, and went & besieged Ptolemais, that would not entertain him. After therefore he had left his lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces he departed with the rest, to enter upon and spoile the countrey of Judaea. Alexander perceiving Ptolomeys intent, assembled about 50000. fighting men of his own countrey, (or as some historians have written, 80000) with whom he went out to fight against Ptolomey, who suddenly setting upon Azoch a city of Galilee on a Sabbath day, took it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantitie of other booty.

Afterwards set upon Sephor a citie neer unto Azoch, from whence he departed with the losse of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make head against him, and met with him neer unto Jordan, in a place called Asophon, and encamped right over against the enemy. He had in his vanguard 8000. men, whom he called combattants by the hundreds, who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomeys foreward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceiving themselves to be inferiours in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazard battell. But Philostephanus the camp-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to passe the flood, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the river on their backs, he should be the more assured of them, that they should not warrantize themselves from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought, with answerable valour, so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiving that Alexanders army had the better, he took a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselves: The wing of the Jews vanguard that saw themselves freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to flie; and so far were those that marched next them, from yeelding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became partners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomeys side behaved themselves farre otherwise: for they pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarmed them, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their arms with killing them. It is reported that thirty thousand men were slain in the battell (Timagenes saith, fifty thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and other some fled unto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, he overranne and spoiled the whole countrey, and in the evening he quartered himselfe in certain villages of Judaea, which he found full of women and children, and commanded his souldiers without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into pieces; and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were well sod, to eat the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battell, and retired to their own habitations, should know that their enemies would eat mens flesh, that by this means they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselves after this maner, as I have declared. And Ptolomey took Ptolemais also by force, as I have made known else where.

Cleopatra
prepareth an army against
her sonne.

But Cleopatra perceiving how her sonne prospered, and how he had spoyled Jewry without any prejudice, and subjected the Citie of Gaza to his command: she concluded with her selfe, that she ought not to suffer him to increase after that maner, considering it was upon the borders of Egypt, whose soveraigntie he affected. For which cause, she suddenly marched out against him, with an army both by sea and land, committing the command of her whole forces to Gbelcius & Ananias, both Jews, and sent the greater part of her riches into the Ile of Cos, with her nephews, and her testament, to be reserved and kept there in safety.

A safety. And after she had commanded her sonne Alexander to set sail toward Phœnicia, with a great navy, because the inhabitants of that countrey were revolted from her obeisance: she herself departed and came to Ptolemais, and besieged it, when she perceived that they refused to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haste to depart out of Syria, and to enter Egypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he should finde the countrey disfurnished of men of warre. But this purpose failed him. At that time it fortun'd, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatra's armie, died in Coelosyria, being in pursuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra having tydings of her sonnes enterprize, and that the successe and fortune he expected in Egypt had failed him, she sent part of her armie to drive him out of the countrey; so that he was enforced to return back again out of Egypt, and to go and spend his winter at Gaza. Mean while Cleopatra besieged and took the citie of Ptolemais, whither Alexander resorted
 B unto her, with great presents, and an answerable respect unto his fortune, who had been so untowardly handled by Ptolomey, having now no other recourse left him but to her favour and assistance. Upon his arrivall, certain of her familiars counsell'd her to lay hands on him, and to seize the countrey: and not to permit that so great a number of Jews, and they so valiant men, should become subjects unto one man. But Ananias gave her counsell to the contrary, alleadging that she should commit an act of great injustice, if she should depose him, who was her allie, from the government; who was beside that, very neerly allied unto her. For (said he) I would you should know, that by committing this wrong, you shall raise in all the rest of the Jews a hainous hatred against you. Cleopatra conforming her self according to
 C Ananias counsell, resolv'd with her self to offer Alexander no injurie; but in stead thereof she entertained him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a citie of Coelosyria. Now when Alexander perceived, that he was discharged of the fear which he had conceived in respect of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his army into Coelosyria, and after six moneths siege, took Gadara: he took shortly after Amath also (which is a great fortresse belonging to the inhabitants about Jordan) where Theodore the sonne of Zemon had hoorded up the richest and goodliest part of his substance: who surprizing the Jews at unawares, slew about ten thousand of them, and pillaged Alexander's baggage.

This did not any wayes astonish Alexander: but notwithstanding the dysaster, he march'd forward toward the cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, situate on the sea-coasts, and took them perforce; and seeing that Ptolomey was retired from D Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Egypt, he besieged the citie of Gaza, and spoiled all the countrey round about it, by reason of the displeasure which he had conceived against the citizens, for that they had sought their assistance at Ptolomey's hands against him. Against him Apollodorus Captain of the Gazeans made a sally by night, and entered the camp of the Jews, having onely with him two thousand strange souldiers, and one thousand of his own followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazeans had the upper hand, because that they made their enemies beleieve that Ptolomey was come to their rescue, and to assault the Jews afresh: but as soon as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soon as the Jews were assured of the truth, they turned back upon them, and charging the Gazeans, they slew about some one thousand fighting men of them.

E All this notwithstanding, they bethought them on no surrender, but stood out, being neither amated with losse of men, or lack of provision whatsoever, resolving themselves rather to endure any misery, then to submit themselves into the hands of their enemies: and that which made them more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas King of Arabia, who had promised no lesse. But it came to passe that Apollodorus was slain before his arrivall, and the citie taken. For Lyfimachus his brother conceived a jealousie against him, by reason of the good opinion which the inhabitants had of him, and having slain him, and gathered those fighting men that he might, he yeelded up the citie unto Alexander, who at the first made a peaceable entrie, but afterwards disperst his souldiers, and gave
 F them licence to execute all hostilitie against the citizens: so that they acted their crueltie in every place; and slew many of the Gazeans: Neither died these citizens unrevenged, but so manfully behaved they themselves, that they butchered no lesse number of Jews, then they murdered citizens among them. Some of them likewise perceiving themselves to be alone, set fire upon their houses, taking away first that which was therein; to the intent that the enemy might be enriched with none of their spoils. Othersome killed their wives and children with their own hands, meaning this way to deliver them from the enemies servitude. But the Senators, to the number of five hundred, were fled into the Temple of Apollo (for at such time as the enemy entered the town, they were by chance assembled in counsell) all these did Alexander put to the sword, and instantly razed and levelled that Citie with the ground:

fourty and fifth year of his age, and in the nine and twentieth of his reign. His sonne Seleucus had the kingdome after him, who made warre against his uncle Antiochus, surnamed Cyzicenus, and having overcome and taken him, he slew him. Not long after, Antiochus the sonne
of Cyzicenus, and Antoninus, surnamed the Devout, came to Arade, and placed the Diadems
upon their heads, and made warre against Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and drave him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriving again in the citie of the Mopsceates, he exacted a summe of money at the citizens hands. But the people were so incensed, that they set fire on his palace, whereby it came to passe, that both he and his friends were burned to dust. During the time that Antiochus the sonne of Cyzicenus reigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made warre against him; but he was not onely overcome, but both he and his army were put to the sword. After him, Philip his sonne took the Diadem, and governed in certain places of Syria.

Mean while Ptolomey Lathurus sent to Gnidus for his fourth brother Demetrius Eucerus, and made him King of Damasco. Against these two brothers Antiochus made a manly and valiant resistance, but died very shortly after. For repairing to Laodicea to succour the Queen of the Galadenians, who made warre against the Parthians, he died fighting valiantly, and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip possessed Syria, as hereafter shall be declared. As for Alexander, a domesticall sedition was raised against him, for the people arose and mutined at such time, as he assisted at the Altar to solemnize the feast of Tabernacles, and during the time that he intended the sacrifice, they cast Citrons at him: for (as we have declared elsewhere)
the Jews have this custome, that on the feast of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palm, and of Citrons. They upbraided him also with many injurious speeches, reproach-
ing him, that he had been prisoner in warre; and that he was also unworthy of the honour of the Priesthood. Whereupon, he being moved by these disgraces, slaughtered about six thousand men: and having made an inclosure of wood about the Temple and the Altar (as farre
as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Priests) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained also certain strange souldiers Pisidians and Cilicians. For in that he was at oddes with the Syrians, he made no use of them.

After this, having overcome the Arabians, he constrained the Moabites and Galaadites to pay him tribute, and destroyed the Citie of Amath whilest Theodore for fear gave over to resist him. But encountering with Obeda the King of Arabia, and being surprised and betrayed
by an ambuscado in certain miry and unhaunted places, he was thrust by the presse of the camels into a deep trench (neer unto Gadara a village of Galaad) from whence he almost despaired to escape: notwithstanding, avoiding that danger, he came to Jerusalem. And besides this his last mishap, the people hated him, against whom he made warre for the space of six years, and slew at the least fiftie thousand of them: and the more he intreated them to compromit these hainous debates between them, the more grievous displeasure conceived
they against him, because of the inconveniences they had suffered: so that when he demanded
of them what they would have him to do, they all of them with one voice cried out, that he
questing him of his favour and assistance.

DEMETRIUS EUCAERUS overcomeh ALEXANDER in battell.

HE coming onward with his army, and taking with him those who had incited him to the enterprize, came and encamped neer unto the citie of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together some twenty thousand Jews (whom he knew to be well affected towards him) with six thousand and two hundred mercenary souldiers and strangers, marched forward against Demetrius, who led with him three thousand horsemen, and fourtie thousand footmen. Both on the one and the other side there fell out many subtill stratagems: the one of them striving on the one side to inveigle and withdraw the forrain souldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himself to reconcile those Jews that were of Demetrius followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other prevailed ought at all by these devices: so that finally they were driven to decide their quarrell by the sword: in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand. For all the strangers that were on Alexanders side, were every one hewed in pieces, after they had made sufficient proof both of their faith and valour. There died also many of Demetrius souldiers.

But

But after that Alexander had fled unto the mountains, divers Jews (to the number of six thousand) in commiseration of his desperate estate, and through the fear they had of Demetrius, resorted unto him; which when the Conqueror heard, he retired himself. After this, the Jews made warre against Alexander, and in divers losses which they received, there died a great number of them in divers combates. Finally, after he had closed up the most strongest amongst them in the citie of Bethon, he besieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them under his subjection, he carried them to Jerusalem, where he perpetrated an unspeakable and cruell murder. For whilest he banquetted with his concubines, in the sight of them all, he commanded eight hundred of them or thereabout to be crucified, and before their eyes whilest they yet lived, he caused their wives and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to revenge himself of those wrongs which he had received: but he exceeded the bounds of humanity herein; notwithstanding they had rebelled against him; and reduced him into a most piteous estate, and put him in danger both of his life and kingdom. For being not content to assaile and make warre upon him with their forces, they drew strangers also in his countrey against him; and finally, they overpressed him in such sort, that he was constrained to yeeld up into the King of Arabias hands, the countreies and cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for fear lest they should joyn with the Jews, and make warre against him; besides other innumerable injuries and outrages committed by them against him. This notwithstanding it cannot be excused, but that he overthrew himself herein; so that by reason of this enormous crueltie, he was called Thracidas, that is to say, as cruell as a Thracian: and this title continued amongst the Jews. The souldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thousand, fled by night into strong and sure holds; and as long as Alexander lived, they were in exile. But at the last, after he was delivered of all these troubles, he lived in quiet, and governed his kingdom peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing from Judea to Bercea, besieged his brother Philip with ten thousand footmen, and one thousand horse. But Iranon Lord of Bercea, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces governour of the Parthians, unto his help, who repairing unto him with great forces, besieged Demetrius in his own trenches, in which they so inclosed him by continuall shooting of darts, and want of water, that they constrained him, and those that were with him, to submit themselves to their mercy. When as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were seized of Demetrius, they sent him prisoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the camp, were suffered to depart with the safety of their lives and baggage, and to return to Antioch. But Mithridates King of Parthia honoured Demetrius, by all means possible, untill such time as he was surprised with a sickness, whereof he died, incontinently after the battell. Philip came into Antioch, and having obtained the kingdom, ruled over Syria.

The exploits of ANTIOCHUS DIONYSIUS against Judea.

After this, Antiochus called Dionysius (who was Philip's brother) came into Damascus to obtain the sovereignty therein, and therein in short space accomplishing his affairs, got possession of the crown. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readinesse to invade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damascus with great speed, and made him surrender up the Citie, both by the means of Milesius whom Antiochus had left governour in the Castle; as also by the consent of the citizens themselves. But Philip shewed himself ungratefull toward Milesius, performing nothing of that which he had promised him, at such time as he delivered him the Citie; because his intent was, that the world should think that the fear of his power, and not Milesius's favour, was the cause of the surprisall of Damascus. Which act of his drew him into suspicion with Milesius, and was the cause that he lost the city again. For departing from thence to exercise himself at tilt, Milesius locked the gates against him, and kept the city for Antiochus. Who having intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very instant led his army into Judea, in which there were eight thousand footmen, and eight hundred horsemen. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deep trench from Caparab (which is called at this day Antipatris) as farre as the sea of Joppe (which was the onely straight whereby he might be assailed) and made a wall furnished with wooden towers, with their courts of guard, distant the one from the other an hundredth and fiftie furlongs, furlongs, to keep back Antiochus. But he fired all these his fortifications, and made his army to passe into Arabia thorow this streight. The King of Arabia retired upon the first assault; but afterwards he presently came into the field with ten thousand horsemen: whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onset lost his life (yet with victory) whilest he fought to succour a company of his men that were hardly laid to. After Antiochus death, his army retired to the borough of Cana, where divers of them died for hunger.

After him Arctas reigned in Coelosyria, who was called unto that kingdome by those that held Damasco and hated Ptolomey the sonne of Mennans. Arctas led his army into Jewry, and got a victory against Alexander neer to Adida: which done, he retired out of Judea, upon a composition made between them. Moreover, once more Alexander marched towards the citie of Dion, and took the same. And afterwards he led his army against Bssa, where Zen had hoorded up his chiefest riches: and before he assailed the fortresse, he invironed the place with three huge walls, which he builded round about it, and having taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana, and Seleucia: which when he had overcome, he made himself master of a valley called the Valley of Antiochus, with the fortresse of Gamala. And objecting many crimes against Demetrius the Lord of those places, he dispossessed him of his government. Finally, after he had made warre for the space of three whole years, he returned into his countrey: where the Jews entertained him willingly by reason of the happy exploits which he had atchieved.

About the same time the Jews were already possessed of the cities of Syria, Idumaea, and Phoenicia: of the Tower of Straton, Apollonia, Joppe, Jamnia, Azoth, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Rhinocura, all which were neer unto the Sea: and in the firm land on the one side of Idumaea, as Adora, Marissa, and all Samaria; the Mounts Carmel and Itabyr; and here with Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, Gabala; and of Moab, Essebon, Medaba, Lemba, Orona, Telithon, and Zara; Antona of Cilicia and Pella. This last City was razed by them, because the inhabitants would not promise to convert themselves to the religion of the Jews) with divers other of the principall cities of Syria also; which were conquered by them.

After this, King Alexander fell sick, by the means of his surfeit and drunkenness, and for the space of three years he was travelled with a quartane ague. This notwithstanding, he was alwayes in the camp, untill such time as being wearied with travels, he died in the marches of the countrey of the Gerasens, at such time as he besieged Regaba (which is a Castle situate on the other side of Jordan.) The Queen perceiving that he was at deaths door, and that there remained neither hope of life, nor recoverie, she began to weep and lament, and to beat her breasts, because both she and her children were likely now to be left desolate, and in these words she bemoaned her self unto him: To whom wilt thou leave both me and thy children in the estate, wherein we be? or why should we survive or live one after another, considering that thou assuredly knowest, that the hearts of thy people are estranged from us? Hereupon the King comforted her, and gave her this counsell, that if she would assure the kingdome both unto her and her children, she should behave her self according to his direction: which was, first to conceal his death, and not to suffer his men of warre to have notice thereof, untill such time as she had taken this Castle. Which done, he advised her to repair to Jerusalem in pomp, and triumph; and that being there, she should bestow some authority upon the Pharisees, who should recover her praises, and obtain her favour amongst the people. For (said he) these kinde of men are in great estimation and credit with the people, and can do much hurt unto those they hate, and further them in like sort very mightily towards whom they are well affected: For the people easily beleeveth them, when they urge ought against any man, notwithstanding it be of envie; and that himself also had incurred the displeasure of the people for their sakes, in that he had offended them.

When as therefore (said he) thou shalt arrive in Jerusalem, send thou for the chiefest amongst them, and pray them to come unto thee; and after you have shewed them my dead body, use the most plausible speech that you can, and give them permission to dispose of my body as they list, whether it be their pleasure to interdict and deny me funerall (in that they have received many indignities by me) or whether in avengement of their displeasure, they will offer any ignominie to my body: and promise you them that you will do nothing in the administration or government of the kingdome but by their advice. If in this sort you shape both your maners and discourse towards them, it will come to passe, that I shall be buried by them with great magnificence (which otherwise I could not be by any other means) because they will offer no outrage to my body, no although you should permit them: and besides that, you shall reign in more assurance and quiet.

Hedio & Rutlinus, chap. 22. Hircanus and Aristobulus Alexanders sonnes.

Hircanus high Priest.

The Pharisees admitted to the administration of the commonweal, are greedy of revenge. Aristobulus & his followers accuse the Pharisees of tyrannie.

B After that Alexandra had taken the Castle of Ragaba, she conferred with the Pharisees, according to her husbands counsell, and committed unto their discretion, not onely that which concerned her husbands obsequies, but also the government of the kingdome: whereby she not onely appeased the displeasure which before-time they had conceived against Alexander, but also obtained their good will and amitie. They therefore came and declaimed amongst the people, making an Oration of the acts and gests of Alexander, complaining everywhere that they had lost a good King, and by the inforced praises that they used, they incited the people to great grief and lamentation: so that they buried him with more magnificence, then any King that reigned before him. This Alexander left two sonnes behind him, the one called Hircanus, the other Aristobulus, and by his testament committed the government of the kingdome to Alexandra his wife. For Hircanus was incapable to manage affairs, and rather delighted in peace and quiet, and Aristobulus, who was the younger, was both active and fit for government. The people were well affected towards Alexandra, because she had manifestly expressed how greatly she disliked her husbands misgovernment.

C She appointed Hircanus high Priest (both in regard of his age, as also for that by nature he was composed to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the disposition of the Pharisees, commanding the people to obey and serve them. She also renewed and confirmed that which Hircanus had disannulled, and the Pharisees (according to the customes of their forefathers) had introduced; so that she bare the name, and the Pharisees the authoritie royall. For they restored such as were banished, to their estates, and delivered prisoners; and in all things they demeaned themselves like great Lords, Alexandra also for her part undertook the care of the Common-weal, and kept a great number of souldiers in pay, and increased her power in such sort, that the Tyrants round about her feared her, and delivered the hostages and pledges of peace. All the countrey was at quiet, onely the Pharisees troubled the Queen, perswading her to put those to death, who had counselled King Alexander to put those eight hundred to death (of whom we have spoken before) and they themselves afterwards slew one that was called Diogenes, and after him divers others, one by one: untill such time as those in authority came unto the royall palace, accompanied with Aristobulus (who seemed to be displeased with that which had hapned, and who if the occasion were offered, made shew that he would not permit his mother to govern after that maner) and told her that which had hapned, and in what dangers they had been, to expresse their dutie and loyalty which they ought to their deceased master, and how for that cause they had been greatly honoured by him; requiring her that she would not utterly frustrate them of their hopes, which they expected in lieu of their service, that now they that had escaped from the danger of their forrain enemies, were in their houses murdered like beasts by their private maligners, without any relief or succours from any one. They furthermore urged, that if their adversaries would content themselves with those they had slain, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reason of the sincere affection they bare unto their Lords: but if they must needs as yet suffer the like, they required that they might have licence to depart. For that they would not procure their safetie, otherwise then by her consent, and would rather suffer a voluntary death next unto her royall palace, if they might not be spared: for that it would be a shame both for themselves, and for the Queen, if by her toleration, those who had been her deceased husbands friends, should be thus vexed by them which were his adversaries.

F That Ariste King of Arabia and other Princes, would be glad of this news, to hear that she should estrange those persons faire from her, whose names have been dreadfull even amongst those neighbouring Kings who have but heard the same. And if she had resolved to make more account of the Pharisees favour, then of their service, they besought her that she would at least-wise distribute them in severall castles, for that rather then any mishap should pursue their sovereign Alexanders house, they were content to lead their lives in that contemptible and abject condition. Whilst thus they spake, and exclaimed on the soul of Alexander, praying him to have compassion as well of those that were already dead, as of those who

who were in danger of their lives, the tears ranne from the eyes of all the assistants: and Aristobulus above the rest was heartily discontent, and expressed the same by expostulating the cause with his mother. But they themselves were the cause of their own calamitie, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a head-strong and ambitious woman to reign over them, as if the King had no heirs reserved to succeed him in the kingdome. The Queen uncertain how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reserving onely Hircania, Alexandria, and Macharon, where in the Princes moveables and wealth was kept.

Not long after, she sent her sonne Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Mennas, who was an ill neighbour unto that Citie: but he returned thence without achieving any memorable action. About the same time news was brought, that Tigranes King of Armenia invaded Syria, with five hundred thousand men of warre, intending shortly to set upon Jewry. This rumor affrighted the Queen, and all the commonalty (and not without cause.) Whereupon she sent Embassadors with many princely presents unto Tigranes, who besieged the citie of Ptolemais. (For Queen Selena, otherwise called Clappatra, reigned in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alexandras Embassadors met with the King of Armenia, and besought him to conceive a good opinion of their Queen, and of all the whole nation of the Jews: who received them willingly, praising them for that they had sought him out so farre to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and foraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this news, returned back into his country.

After this, Queen Alexandra fell sick of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristobulus took occasion to intermeddle with the affairs of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trustie servant, he repaired unto those Castles, which were committed to the custodie of his fathers friends: for of long time he had misliked his mothers Government, and now was the more afraid that if she should happen to die, all her posteritie should be made subject to the power of the Pharisees. For he well perceived how unfit his elder brother was to govern the kingdome, unto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: onely his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galles one of the chiefeest Potentates commanded, who entertained him with great joy.

The next day, the Queen hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected she at the first, that he was retired to work some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second; and after the second, all the rest had consequently been surpris'd by Aristobulus: at that time both the Queen and the whole nation were dismayed, fearing lest he should presently usurpe the soveraigntie; but above all they feared, lest he should revenge himself on those, who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife and children should be committed to the Castle that adjoynd the Temple. But from all parts round about resorted there souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a King: for in the space of some fifteen dayes he took twenty and two forts, whither he made his retreats, and assembled an army of souldiers, and levied them amongst the Lords that inhabit Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude hath alwayes resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintain and roiallize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as being those that were the occasion of the confirmation of his Monarchie.

Hereupon the ancient Jews and Hircanus repaired unto the Queen, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsell and good advice touching the present affairs; because that Aristobulus her sonne was already wellnigh Lord of the whole countrey, since he had so many forts under his command: Furthermore, that it was inconvenient and undecent for them to consult without her expresse order, notwithstanding she were grievously sick, but that the impendent danger extorted the same. The Queen willed them to do that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weal, telling them that they had many means, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong; and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasure: certifying them, that because she knew that she had not long to live, she had no more reason to take care of those affairs. Anon after she had spoken thus, she died, after she had reigned nine years, and lived in all seventy and three years. This woman was adorned with greater excellencie then could be expected from one of

of her sex, and expressed both in her actions and ordinances how fit she was to govern a kingdome, and how oftentimes men thorow imprudence over shoot themselves in affairs of estate. For making more account of the present then future occurrences, and neglecting all other things in respect of those which are requisite in a moderated government, she never upon any instigation whatsoever perverted justice, notwithstanding her family fell into such inconveniences, that the same sovereignty, which she had obtained by her dangers and travels, was not long after that ruinated and lost for her scarce effeminate desires. For she gave eare unto those, who were ill affected towards her posterity, and left the kingdome destitute of such as were fit to govern: so that the government which she enjoyed during her life time, was after her death distracted with infinite troubles, and calamities, wherewith her family was replenished. And notwithstanding her regiment after this maner, yet during her life time she kept the kingdome in peace. And thus died Alexandra.

who were in danger of their lives, the tears ranne from the eyes of all the assistants: and Aristobulus above the rest was heartily discontent, and expressed the same by expostulating the cause with his mother. But they themselves were the cause of their own calamitie, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a head-strong and ambitious woman to reign over them, as if the King had no heirs reserved to succeed him in the kingdome. The Queen uncertain how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reserving onely Hircania, Alexandria, and Macharon, where-in the Princes moveables and wealth was kept.

Not long after, she sent her sonne Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Mennan, who was an ill neighbour unto that Citie: but he returned thence without atchieving any memorable action. About the same time news was brought, that Tigranes King of Armenia invaded Syria, with five hundred thousand men of warre, intending shortly to set upon Jewry. This rumor affrighted the Queen, and all the commonalty (and not without cause.) Whereupon she sent Embassadors with many princely presents unto Tigranes, who besieged the citie of Ptolemais. (For Queen Selena, otherwise called Cléopatra, reigned in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alexandras Embassadors met with the King of Armenia, and besought him to conceive a good opinion of their Queen, and of all the whole nation of the Jews: who received them willingly, praising them for that they had sought him out so farre to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and foraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this news, returned back into his countrey.

After this, Queen Alexandra fell sick of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristobulus took occasion to intermeddle with the affairs of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trustie servant, he repaired unto those Castles, which were committed to the custodie of his fathers friends: for of long time he had misliked his mothers Government, and now was the more afraid that if she should happen to die, all her posteritie should be made subject to the power of the Pharisees. For he well perceived how unfit his elder brother was to govern the kingdome, unto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: onely his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes one of the chiefeft Potentates commanded, who entertained him with great joy.

The next day, the Queen hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected she at the first, that he was retired to work some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second, and after the second, all the rest had consequently been surprised by Aristobulus: at that time both the Queen and the whole nation were dismayed, fearing lest he should presently usurpe the soveraigntie; but above all they feared, lest he should revenge himself on those, who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife and children should be committed to the Castle that adjoynd the Temple. But from all parts round about resorted there souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a King: for in the space of some fifteen dayes he took twenty and two forts, whither he made his retreats, and assembled an army of souldiers, and levied them amongst the Lords that inhabit Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude hath alwayes resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintain and roiallize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as being those that were the occasion of the confirmation of his Monarchie.

Hereupon the ancient Jews and Hircanus repaired unto the Queen, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsell and good advice touching the present affairs, because that Aristobulus her sonne was already wellnigh Lord of the whole countrey, since he had so many forts under his command: Furthermore, that it was inconvenient and undecent for them to consult without her expresse order, notwithstanding she were grievously sick, but that the impendent danger extorted the same. The Queen willed them to do that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weal, telling them that they had many means, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong, and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasure: certifying them, that because she knew that she had not long to live, she had no more reason to take care of those affairs. Anon after she had spoken thus, she died, after she had reigned nine years, and lived in all seventy and three years. This woman was adorned with greater excellencie then could be expected from one of her sex, and expressed both in her actions and ordinances how fit she was to govern a kingdome, and how oftentimes men thorow imprudence over-shoot themselves in affairs of estate. For making more account of the present then future occurrences, and neglecting all other things in respect of those which are requisite in a moderated government, she never upon any instigation whatsoever perverted justice, notwithstanding her family fell into such inconveniences, that the same sovereignty, which she had obtained by her dangers and travels, was not long after that ruinated and lost for her scarce effeminate desires. For she gave eare unto those, who were ill-affected towards her posterity, and left the kingdome destitute of such as were fit to govern: so that the government which she enjoyed during her life time, was after her death distracted with infinite troubles, and calamities, wherewith her family was replenished. And notwithstanding her regiment after this maner, yet during her life time she kept the kingdome in peace. And thus died Alexandra.

CHAP. I.

How after the contention between the two brethren touching the Kingdome, it was agreed that ARISTOBULUS should be King, and HIRCANUS live as a private man.

The year of the world, 3899. before Christs Nativity, 65.

The office and duty of an Historiographer.

We have already intreated in our former Book, both of the acts, and death of Queen Alexandra: it now remaineth at this present to prosecute and continue the sequell of our Historie, to the end that we neither omit any thing through ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulness. For they that make profession to write Histories, and to recire such things as are observed by Antiquitie, ought not onely studiously to conform their style, but also to beautifie the same, with ornaments of eloquence, to the intent the Reader may converse in their writings with the more delectation. But above all things they must have an especiall care so exactly to set down the truth, that they, who know not how these things came to passe, may be the more duly and fitly informed.

Aristobulus and Hircanus strive for the kingdome.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken upon him the high Priesthood, in the third year of the hundred seventy and seven Olympiade, and in the year that Q. Hortensius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretenian) were Consuls at Rome, Aristobulus suddenly undertook the warre against Hircanus, and fought with him neer unto Jericho: where a great number of Hircanus followers submitted themselves of their own accord to Aristobulus. Through which accident Hircanus was enforced to flee to the forresse of the higher City, where Alexandra Aristobulus mother had imprisoned both his wife and children (as before this is specified.) Therest of the faction for fear of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themselves within the enclosure of the Temple, where they were besieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their difference was accorded in this maner, that Hircanus should passe the remnant of his life without intermeddling with affairs of estate, but should onely intend his securitie and peace, and Aristobulus should command the kingdome. This league was ratified between them in the Temple, and confirmed with oaths, conjunction of hands and embraces, in the sight of all the people: which being finished, Aristobulus retired himself into the Palace, and Hircanus to Aristobulus lodging, to lead a private and quiet life.

The peace betwixt Hircanus and Aristobulus.

CHAP. II.

Of the race of ANTIPATER, and how he is advanced to high estate, and how HIRCANUS flieth to ARABIA King of Arabia.

Herod & Rufinus, chap. 11. Antipater the Idumean Hircanus friend. Antipater of Judaea, as Nicholas Damascenus implies, first called Anipatas.

BUT a certain friend of Hircanus (by nation an Idumean, and by name Antipater) being well favoured, and by nature both factious and industrious, and through ambition but badly affected towards Aristobulus, the rather for that he affected Hircanus faction, but to stirre much trouble. True it is that Nicholas Damascenus writeth of this man, that he was descended from the noblest amongst those Jews who returned from out of Babylon into Jewry: but this he did of set purpose to gratifie Herod, Antipaters sonne, who by a casualty became afterwards King of the Jews (as we will expresse hereafter in time and place convenient.) This Antipater was at the first called Antipater, according to his fathers name, who (as it is reported) was made Governour of all Idumea.

mæa by King Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazæans, and Ascalonites, corrupting them, and insinuating himself into their favours by divers great presents bestowed upon them. This young Antipater considering with himself what Aristobulus power was, and fearing lest some mischief might befall him through the hatred the young King had conceived against him, he communicated with certain of the greatest reckning amongst the Jews, and secretly and cunningly incensed them against Aristobulus, telling them that they had done amisse, both to see and suffer Aristobulus to detain the kingdome unjustly in his hands, and to dispossesse his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. He likewise accosted and sounded Hircanus ordinarily with these words, telling him that he lived in danger of his life, and would doubtlesse be overtaken, except he sought his own securitie, and fled his imminent perill: alleadging, that Aristobulus friends would never cease to consult how they might shorten his life, to the end that he might live in more securitie. To these instigations of his, Hircanus gave small credit (for that of his own nature he was courteous, and could not easily be induced or seduced by detractions) but this negligence and carelesnesse in him, was the cause that he was accounted a filly and abject man. On the contrarie side, Aristobulus was of a different and more heroick nature, being more active in performance, and carefull prevention.

Now although Antipater saw that Hircanus made small account of his instigations, yet ceased he not daily to invent and propose new surmizes and accusations, urging Aristobulus hatred & practice to murder him: and so much prevailed he by his importunitie, that at last he perswaded him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, promising him that in so doing, he would give him both aid and assistance. Hircanus having debated upon these conclusions, at last thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined upon Jewry.) Whereupon he first of all sent Antipater to Aretas, to take assurance of him that he should not betray him into his enemies hands, if so be he should submit himself unto him, and require his assistance. When as therefore Antipater had received this assurance from the King, he returned to Jerusalem unto Hircanus: and not long after that took him away with him, and departed the Citie by night, and afterwards with great journeyes arrived at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall Court. And for that he was inwardly familiar with the King, he besought him to reestablish him in the kingdome of Jewry, and wrought so much, as by his importunitie and the presents which he gave him, that he perswaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promised, that if he confirmed him again in his royall dignity, he would upon the recoverie of his Realm, restore unto him those twelve Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are these that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Livias, Tharabasa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Narissa, Rydda, Lusa, Oryba.

CHAP. III.

ARISTOBULUS being vanquished, is pursued as farre as Jerusalem.

ARETAS induced by these promises, was content to send forth an army against Aristobulus, and himself in person conducted onward in that expedition fiftie thousand men both on foot and horse, and had the upper hand of his enemy in such sort, as divers after the attainment of this victory, of their own accord submitted themselves to Hircanus: and Aristobulus perceiving himself to be destitute of all his friends and followers, fled unto Jerusalem. After him the King of Arabia led his army with all expedition, and besieged him in the Temple: In this siege the common people assisted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Priests onely that stuck to Aristobulus side. Whereupon Aretas marshalled the forces he had, and busily set the army both of Jews and Arabians about the siege. Whilest these things were under these termes, the feast of unleavened bread, which we call the Passover, was at hand, and the Princes of the Jews forsaking their countrey were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certain man called Onias (such a one who for his vertue was beloved of God, and in times past had by his devout prayers and supplications in a time of drought, obtained raine from God (hid himself, perceiving that this sedition would be of some continuance. This man therefore being surprized and brought into the campe of the Jews, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained water, so at that time likewise he would by his imprecations incense God against Aristobulus, and his complices. But whereas he contradicted and excused himself, he was at last constrained by the people to performe their request;

quest; so that standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this maner: O God, King of the whole world, since they who are at this present here with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy Priests, I humbly beseech thee, that when they shall require thee to be incensed against their brethren, thou wilt not heare them: and when as likewise they shall provoke thee against the other, thou wilt not respect them. Hereupon, a certain sort of reprobate souldiers amongst the Jews, hearing these words of his, stoned him to death: But God incontinently punished this cruelty in them; and the murder of Onias so cursedly perpetrated, was revenged by this means which ensueth. At such time as Aristobulus and the Priests were besieged, the feast of Easter or the Pascheover fell out, during which time it was an usuall custome among the Jews to honour God with many sacrifices: Now for that they who were with Aristobulus, had not any beasts to offer up in sacrifice, they required the other Jews that were without, that they might have some delivered unto them for their money. Whereunto it was answered, that if they would give one thousand drachmes for every head, they should have some delivered unto them. To this demand of theirs, Aristobulus and the Priests that were with him, willingly condescended, and let down the prefixed price and delivered the same from the wall: but the others, after they had received the money, delivered them not those beasts which they required them to sell them for sacrifice, but so farre were they given over to impiety, that they falsified their oathes not onely toward men, but defrauded God also, in denying that which they had promised toward the furnishing of their sacrifice. For which cause, the Priests (being defrauded in this maner contrary to the oath and protestations of their adversaries) besought God to shew vengeance on their countrey-men, that had committed this hainous and perjurious impiety: neither did God deferre their punishment any long time, but incontinently after he sent a great and violent winde, that spoiled all the fruits of the countrey; so that a measure of Wheat was sold for eleven drachmes.

MEan-while Pompey sent Scaurus into Syria (himself being in person detained in Armenia in pursuit of the warre betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came unto Damasco, he found that Metellus and Lullus had newly taken the city; for which cause he marched onward towards Jewry: Where being arrived, certain Embassadors came unto him in the behalf of Aristobulus, and others also in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacie in the behalf of them both, and offering in eithers respect a tribute of four hundred talents. But Scaurus preferred Aristobulus promises, both for that he was a man of mightier substance and greater minde, and withall more moderate in his demand; whereas Hircanus was poor and covetous, and notwithstanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promise of lesse assurance: For it was a harder matter to subdue a Citie that was so defended and strong, then to repulse a troupe of runnagate Nabatheans, and they scarcely well animated to prosecute that warre. For these causes therefore he (receiving his money) levied the siege, commanding Arctus to return, which if he refused, he declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damasco, and Aristobulus led forth his army against Aretas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and slew about some seven thousand of his enemies, amongst the number of which was Cephalus Antipaters brother.

Pompey com-

and Aristobulus sendeth a royall present
unto him.

NOT long time after this, Pompey came unto Damasco: and as he travelled thro-row Coelosyria, divers Embassadors resorted unto him from all parts of Syria, Egypt and Judaea. For Aristobulus sent him a present of great value, namely, a golden vine of five hundred talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian ma-keth mention in these words: There came an Embassador out of Egypt, bearing a Crown of four thousand pieces of gold, and another from Jewry, with a vine or garden, and

and the workmanship was called Terpole, that is to say, recreation: And this vine have we beheld at this day in the Citie of Rome in the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, having the inscription of Alexander King of the Jews; and it was esteemed and valued at five hundred talents. It is said that Aristobulus Prince of the Jews sent the same. Straight after this, there came other fresh Embassadors unto him (Antipater from Hircanus, and Nicodemus from Aristobulus) who accused those that had taken money, namely, Gabinus, for that he first of all had received three hundred talents beside other presents: and secondly Scarnus, who had received four hundred, alleading that by that means they had incensed them against him. He therefore gave direction, that they should repair unto him about the spring, each of them to justify and maintain their severall rights: as for himself he drew his forces from their wintering places, and marched towards Damasco, destroying in his way a certain fortresse which Antiochus the Cyzicemian had fortified in Apamea. He visited also the countrey of Ptolomey Mennaeus (who was a wicked and perverse man, and no wayes differed from Dionysius Tripolitane) who was punished with the losse of his head, and was united also with him in friendship and affinity, yet acquitted of the death he deserved, by the means of a thousand talents ran-some, which Ptolomey distributed among his souldiers for their pay. He razed likewise the Castle of Lyfias (wherein a Jew called Sylas tyrannized) and passing by the Cities of Helio-polis and Chalcis, and having likewise ascended the mountain (which is between them) he came to Coelosyria, and from Pella repaired to Damasco. In which place he gave audience to the Jews, and their Princes Hircanus and Aristobulus, who were at odds the one against the other, as touching their particular interests, as all the whole nation against them both alleading that they would not be governed by Kings, because their custome was to obey Gods Priests, whom they honoured, affirming that these two brethren (who were descended of the race of Priests) sought to draw their nation under a different form of government, to the intent to reduce them under servitude. Hircanus complained, for that being the elder born, he had been deprived of his inheritance by Aristobulus, and had onely but a small portion of the countrey allotted him, because Aristobulus had seized the rest by force. He complained likewise of those incursions, that both by land and sea Aristobulus fol-lowers had endamaged their frontiers with. For the people had not revolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accusation of his, a thousand of the principallest of the Jews (drawn on by Antipaters perswasion) subscribed, who avowed and justified the same. But Aristobulus answered, that Hircanus was dispossessed of the kingdome, by reason of his incapacitie and naturall defects, alleading for himself, that the government was enforced on him by a necessitie, for fear it should be transported to others: in effect, he protested that he challenged no other Title, then that which his father Alexander had had. He brought in also for his witnesses certain arrogant young men, who were hated for their pomp, purple robes, their curiositie in painting and curling their hair, and hard horse, and other braveries which they presented, not like men that intended to expect judgement, but as if their pre-sence had been to make shew of their pomp. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemn-ed Aristobulus violence, but for that time he dismissed them (after some favourable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their countrey, and deter-mine their differences, after he had seen the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the mean while to live in peace. He used Aristobulus likewise very kindly, fearing lest he should incense the people, and shut up his passage: which notwithstanding came to passe. For Aristobulus came into the citie of Delion, and from thence went into Judaea, without re-spect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

CHAP. VI.

POMPEY maketh himself Lord of the Castles, by a warlike Stratagem.

POMPEY hearing this, was sore displeased herewith, and taking with him his army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damasco, and the rest of Syria, besides the other Romane companies that he had) he marched forth against Aristobulus: when as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behinde him, he came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Judaea) drawing to-ward the heart of the countrey. There found he a goodly Castle situate upon the top of a mountain called Alexandriou, whither Aristobulus was retired. For which cause he sent Em-bassadors to invite him to come and parlee with him: who perswaded by the counsell of many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre against the Romans, came down unto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Castle. And this did he two or three times, alwayes flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the kingdome, and making a shew that he would be obedient unto him in whatsoever he would command. Mean-while he retired himself, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the warre, for fear lest Pompey should transferre the kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he should deliver up the fortresses that he held, and had written with his own hand to the Captains of the garnisons (who otherwise would not have obeyed him) Aristobulus submitted, and in discontent repaired to Jerusalem, with full intent to prepare for warre. Not long after this, when as Pompey marched towards him with his army, certain messengers coming from Pontus, certified him of Mithridates death, who was slain by his sonne Pharnaces.

CHAP. VII.

They of Jerusalem shut the gates against the Romans.

WHEN Pompey was encamped neer unto Jericho (in which place there was a number of Date-trees, and where also groweth that balm which is the most precious of all other ointments, distilling from a little shrub, which is opened and slit by a sharp cutting stone) the next morning he marched towards Jerusalem. At that time Aristobulus (being sorry for his misbehaviour) came unto him, offering him money: and promising him to receive him into Jerusalem, he besought him, that (dismissing publike enmities and quarrels) he would peaceably do what him listed hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condescended to his request, and sent Gabinus with his souldiers, both to receive the money, as also to enter the Citie, but his purpose failed him in both: for Gabinus returned, because he was excluded out of the Citie, neither received he any money, for that Aristobulus souldiers would not permit that any promise should be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth, so that after he had committed Aristobulus to prison, he went in person against the Citie, which was strongly fortified on every side, except toward the quarter that extendeth Northward, which was easie to be beaten down: for this side is invironed with a large and deep valley, compassing the Temple, which is inclosed with a marvellous strong wall of stone.

CHAP. VIII.

BUT within the City, there grew a division and faction, by reason of the difference and dissent opinions of those that kept the same: for some thought good to yeeld up the City into Pompey's hands, other some (that were of Aristobulus faction) counsellor that the gates should be kept shut, and preparation for warre should be made, for that the Romans detained Aristobulus prisoner. These latter prevailing more then the rest, seized the Temple, and breaking down the bridge which was betwixt it and the City, addrested themselves to stand on their defence. But the others not onely delivered the City into Pompey's hands, but the royal palace also: who sent Piso his Lieutenant thither with his forces to take possession thereof, and to plant his garnisons therein, and to fortifie the houses neer adjoining the Temple, and whatsoever convenient habitation without the walls. First therefore Piso offered the besieged certain conditions of peace: which for that they refused, he fortified and shut them in on every side, being in all these his endeavours assisted by Hircanus. On the outside of the Citie, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the Temple (which was the easiest and meekest side to be assaulted) on this side also there were certain high towers, and a huge trench, besides a deep valley that begirt the temple. For towards the city all waies and passages were so broken up, that no man could either go up or down, and the bridge was taken away on that side where Pompey was encamped. Each day did the Romans travel carefully to raise a mound, and taking down all the timber round about them, and having fully supplied the same, the trenching side up (although very hardly, by reason of the incredible depth thereof) the Romans and Engines that were brought from Tyre were added, with which they infused and shot stones against the Temple, and had not the continuance of the country commanded to keep the Sabbath (which was the seventh day of the week) holy, and to labour in no sort on that day, the Romans had never been able to have raised their mound, if they within the temple had opposed themselves against them. For the law permiteth to defend themselves against their enemies, at such time as they are assailed and urged to fight, but not assaile them when they intend any other work. Which when the Romans understood, they neither gave assault, nor proffered skirmish on those daies, which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, & planted their engines, so that the next day they were ready to put them in use against the Jews. And hereby it is easie to conjecture, how incredible the piety of our nation is, and how studious and industrious they be in observing the divine laws. For notwithstanding any present or imminent feare, yet desisted they never to offer their solemne sacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth houre, the Priests offered upon the altar, and notwithstanding any difficultie or danger of the siege that might happen, they omitted not the course of their oblations. For at such time as the temple was taken (in the third moneth, and on a fasting day, in the hundreth seventy nine Olympiade, in the yeer wherein Cajus Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Consuls) the enemy entred the temple by force, and slew those that withstood them. Yet notwithstanding all this, the Priests ceased not to exercise their accustomed sacrifice, and neither the hazard of their lives, nor the great number of those that were dead, could force them to flie, but that they held it more convenient for them to indure all things that might happen in attending upon the Altar, then to transgresse or vary one jot from their ordinances. And that this may seem to be no fable, or praise of their dissembled devotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all those that write the Histories concerning Pompey and his acts, doe witnesse no lesse: amongst the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Livius the Roman Historiographer, the most famous among the rest. The greatest of those towers was battered by these engines, and fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it, which was the cause that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The first that ascended the wall, was Cornelius Faustus the sonne of Sylla, with his souldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with those that followed him, on the other side: and thorow the midst of the breach, did the Centurion Fabius enter with a strong Squadron. The whole circuit was filled with murders; and some of the Jews died by the Romans swords, other some slew one another, the rest cast themselves down headlong from the steepe places: many likewise set fire on their houses, and consumed themselves therein, for feare they should behold the executions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelve thousand Jews, and very few Romans. Abisalom also, who was Aristobulus father in law, and uncle, was taken prisoner. The religion of the Temple likewise was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the temple, Pompey and divers others that accompanied him, entred the same, and saw that which was not lawfull to be beheld by any other but the high Priests onely. But although he found a table of gold, and a sacred candlestick, with divers other vessels and odoriferous drugs in great quantitie; and whereas besides that, there was about two thousand talents of silver in the sacred treasury in the Temple: yet touched he nothing thereof through the reverence he had of G O D; and herein he behaved himselfe answerably to his other vertues. The next day he commanded those that had the charge of the Temple, to purge the same, & to offer sacrifices unto God, according to the law; committing the high Priesthood to Hircanus hands, both for that he had stood him in great stead in many things, as for that he had hindered the Jews, that were of the countrey, from joyning themselves with Aristobulus. After this, he beheaded the authors of this warre, and honoured Faustus and the rest with condigne gifts, who with great courage had first attempted and ascended the wall. As for Jerusalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Jews those Cities they had conquered in Coelosyria, and assigning them a proper and peculiar government. After this, he inclosed the nation within certain limits, whereas before time their dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, he repaired Gadara, that not long before was destroyed: all which he performed in favour of Demetrius the Gadarenian his late servant and bondman. And as touching Hippus, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaris, Marissa, Amit, Iamnia, and Arcthusa, he restored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were situate in the heart of the land: Besides, Gaza, Joppa, Deon, and the tower of Sidon (cities situate upon the sea-coast and ruined before times with divers warres) he set at libertie, and annexed them unto the province. As for the tower of Sidon, it was magnificently builded by Hiram, and decked with gates and faire Temples, & the name thereof was changed and called Cadmus. Thus Hircanus & Aristobulus, through their dissensions and civill broyles, were the cause of that servitude and misery that fell upon the Jews. For we have lost our libertie, and have been subdured by the Romans. Besides that, we have been enforced to surrender up those Cities unto the Syrians, which we beforetime

The office and dutie of an Historiographer.

WE have already intreated in our former Book, both of the acts, and death of Queen Alexandra: it now remaineth at this present to prosecute and continue the sequell of our Historie, to the end that we neither omit any thing through ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulness. For they that make profession to write Histories, and to recite such things as are observed by Antiquitie, ought not onely studiously to conform their style, but also to beautifie the same, with ornaments of eloquence, to the intent the Reader may converse in their writings with the more delectation. But above all things they must have an especiall care so exactly to set down the truth, that they, who know not how these things came to passe, may be the more duly and fitly informed.

Aristobulus and Hircanus strive for the kingdome.

The peace betwixt Hircanus and Aristobulus.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken upon him the high Priesthood, in the third year of the hundred seventy and seven Olympiade, and in the year that Q. Hortensius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretensian) were Consuls at Rome, Aristobulus suddenly undertook the warre against Hircanus, and fought with him neer unto Jericho: where a great number of Hircanus followers submitted themselves of their own accord to Aristobulus. Through which accident Hircanus was enforced to flee to the forresse of the higher City, where Alexandra Aristobulus mother had imprisoned both his wife and children (as before this is specified.) The rest of the faction for fear of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themselves within the enclosure of the Temple, where they were besieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their difference was accorded in this maner, that Hircanus should passe the remnant of his life without intermeddling with affairs of estate, but should onely intend his securitie and peace; and Aristobulus should command the kingdome. This league was ratified between them in the Temple, and confirmed with oaths, conjunction of hands and embraces, in the sight of all the people: which being finished, Aristobulus retired himself into the Palace, and Hircanus to Aristobulus lodging, to lead a private and quiet life.

CHAP. II.

Of the race of ANTIPATER, and how he is advanced to high estate, and how HIRCANUS flieth to ARETAS King of Arabia.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 11. Antipater the Idumæan Hircanus friend. Antipater of Judæa, as Nicholas Damascenus implies, first called Antipas.

BUT a certain friend of Hircanus (by nation an Idumæan, and by name Antipater) being well wiled, and by nature both factious and industrious, and through ambition but badly affected towards Aristobulus, the rather for that he affected Hircanus faction, but to stirre much trouble. True it is that Nicholas Damascene writeth of this man, that he was descended from the noblest amongst those Jews who returned from out of Babylon into Jewry: but this he did of set purpose to gratifie Herod, Antipaters sonne, who by a casualty became afterwards King of the Jews (as we will expresse hereafter in time and place convenient.) This Antipater was at the first called Antipas, according to his fathers name, who (as it is reported) was made Governour of all Idumæa.

Amaea by King Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Ascalonites, corrupting them, and insinuating himself into their favours by divers great presents bestowed upon them. This young Antipater considering with himself what Aristobulus power was, and fearing lest some mischief might befall him through the hatred the young King had conceived against him, he communicated with certain of the greatest reckning amongst the Jews, and secretly and cunningly incensed them against Aristobulus, telling them that they had done amisse, both to see and suffer Aristobulus to detain the kingdome unjustly in his hands, and to dispossesse his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. He likewise accosted and sounded Hircanus ordinarily with these words, telling him that he lived in danger of his life, and would doubtlesse be overtaken, except he sought his own securitie, and fled his imminent perill: alleading, that Aristobulus friends would never cease to consult how they might shorten his life, to the end that he might live in more securitie. To these instigations of his, Hircanus gave small credit (for that of his own nature he was courteous, and could not easily be induced or seduced by detractions) but this negligence and carelesnesse in him, was the cause that he was accounted a silly and abject man. On the contrarie side, Aristobulus was of a different and more heroick nature, being more active in performance, and carefull prevention.

Now although Antipater saw that Hircanus made small account of his instigations; yet ceased he not daily to invent and propose new surmizes and accusations, urging Aristobulus hatred & practice to murder him: and so much prevailed he by his importunitie, that at last he perswaded him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, promising him that in so doing, he would give him both aid and assistance. Hircanus having debated upon these conclusions, at last thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined upon Jewry.) Whereupon he first of all sent Antipater to Aretas, to take assurance of him that he should not betray him into his enemies hands, if so be he should submit himself unto him, and require his assistance. When as therefore Antipater had received this assurance from the King, he returned to Jerusalem unto Hircanus: and not long after that took him away with him, and departed the Citie by night, and afterwards with great journeys arrived at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall Court. And for that he was inwardly familiar with the King, he besought him to reestablish him in the kingdome of Jewry, and wrought so much, as by his importunitie and the presents which he gave him, that he perswaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promised, that if he confirmed him again in his royall dignity, he would upon the recoverie of his Realm, restore unto him those twelve Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are these that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Livias, Tharabasa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Narissa, Rydda, Lusa, Oryba.

ARETAS induced by these promises, was content to send forth an army against Aristobulus, and himself in person conducted onward in that expedition fiftie thousand men both on foot and horse, and had the upper hand of his enemy in such sort, as divers after the attainment of this victory, of their own accord submitted themselves to Hircanus: and Aristobulus perceiving himself to be destitute of all his friends and followers, fled unto Jerusalem. After him the King of Arabia led his army with all expedition, and besieged him in the Temple: In this siege the common people assisted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Priests onely that stuck to Aristobulus side. Whereupon Aretas marshalled the forces he had, and busily set the army both of Jews and Arabians about the siege. Whilest these things were under these termes, the feast of unleavened bread, which we call the Pasche, was at hand, and the Princes of the Jews forsaking their countrey were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certain man called Onias (such a one who for his vertue was beloved of God, and in times past had by his devout prayers and supplications in a time of drought, obtained raine from God (hid himself, perceiving that this sedition would be of some continuance. This man therefore being surprized and brought into the campe of the Jews, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained water: so at that time likewise he would by his imprecations incense God against Aristobulus, and his complices. But whereas he contradicted and excused himself, he was at last constrained by the people to performe their request;

quest; so that standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this maner: O God, King of the whole world, since they who are at this present here with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy Priests, I humbly beseech thee, that when they shall require thee to be incensed against their brethren, thou wilt not heare them: and when as likewise they shall provoke thee against the other, thou wilt not respect them. Hereupon, a certain sort of reprobate souldiers amongst the Jews, hearing these words of his, stoned him to death: But God incontinently punished this crueltie in them; and the murther of Onias so cursedly perpetrated, was revenged by this means which ensueth. At such time as Aristobulus and the Priests were besieged, the feast of Easter or the Passeover fell out, during which time it was an usuall custome among the Jews to honour God with many sacrifices: Now for that they who were with Aristobulus, had not any beasts to offer up in sacrifice, they required the other Jews that were without, that they might have some delivered unto them for their money. Whereunto it was answered, that if they would give one thousand drachmes for every head, they should have some delivered unto them. To this demand of theirs, Aristobulus and the Priests that were with him, willingly condescended, and let down the prefixed price and delivered the same from the wall: but the others, after they had received the money, delivered them not those beasts which they required them to sell them for sacrifice, but so farre were they given over to impiety, that they falsified their oathes not onely toward men, but defrauded God also, in denying that which they had promised toward the furnishing of their sacrifice. For which cause, the Priests (being defrauded in this maner contrary to the oath and protestations of their adversaries) besought God to shew vengeance on their countrey-men, that had committed this hainous and perjurious impiety: neither did God deferre their punishment any long time, but incontinently after he sent a great and violent winde, that spoiled all the fruits of the countrey; so that a measure of Wheat was sold for eleven drachmes.

MEan-while Pompey sent Scaurus into Syria (himself being in person detained in Armenia in pursuit of the warre betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came unto Damasco, he found that Metellus and Lollius had newly taken the city, for which cause he marched onward towards Jewry: Where being arrived, certain Embassadors came unto him in the behalf of Aristobulus, and others also in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacie in the behalf of them both, and offering in eithers respect a tribute of four hundred talents. But Scaurus preferred Aristobulus promises, both for that he was a man of mightier substance and greater minde, and withall more moderate in his demand; whereas Hircanus was poor and covetous, and notwithstanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promise of lesse assurance: For it was a harder matter to subdue a Citie that was so defended and strong, then to repulse a troupe of runnagate Nabatheans, and they scarcely well animated to prosecute that warre. For these causes therefore he (receiving his money) levied the siege, commanding Aretas to return; which if he refused, he declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damasco, and Aristobulus led forth his army against Aretas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and slew about some seven thousand of his enemies, amongst the number of which was Cephalus Antipaters brother.

CHAP. V.

Pompey cometh into Syria, and Aristobulus sendeth a royall present unto him.

NOT long time after this, Pompey came unto Damasco: and as he travelled thorow Cœlosyria, divers Embassadors resorted unto him from all parts of Syria, Egypt and Judæa. For Aristobulus sent him a present of great value, namely, a golden vine of five hundred talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in these words: There came an Embassador out of Egypt, bearing a Crown of four thousand pieces of gold, and another from Jewry, with a vine or garden, and

A and the workmanship was called Terpole, that is to say, recreation: And this vine have we beheld at this day in the Citie of Rome in the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, having the inscription of Alexander King of the Jews; and it was esteemed and valued at five hundred talents. It is said that Aristobulus Prince of the Jews sent the same. Straight after this, there came other fresh Embassadors unto him (Antipater from Hircanus, and Nicodemus from Aristobulus) who accused those that had taken money, namely, Gabinus, for that he first of all had received three hundred talents beside other presents: and secondly Scaurus, who had received four hundred, alleading that by that means they had incensed them against him. He therefore gave direction, that they should repair unto him about the spring, each of them to justifie and maintain their severall rights: as for himself he drew his forces from their winning places, and marched towards Damasco, destroying in his way a certain fortresse which Antiochus the Cyzicene had fortified in Apamea. He visited also the countrey of Ptolomey Mennaeus (who was a wicked and perverse man, and no wayes differed from Dionysius Tripolitane) who was punished with the losse of his head, and was united also with him in friendship and affinitie; yet acquitted of the death he deserved, by the means of a thousand talents ransom, which Ptolomey distributed among his souldiers for their pay. He razed likewise the Castle of Lyfias (wherein a Jew called Sylus tyrannized) and passing by the Cities of Helopolis and Chalcis, and having likewise ascended the mountain (which is between them) he came to Cœlosyria; and from Pella repaired to Damasco. In which place he gave audience to the Jews, and their Princes Hircanus and Aristobulus, who were at oddes the one against the other, as touching their particular interests, as all the whole nation against them both: alleading that they would not be governed by Kings, because their custome was to obey Gods Priests, whom they honoured, affirming that these two brethren (who were descended of the race of Priests) sought to draw their nation under a different form of government, to the intent to reduce them under servitude. Hircanus complained, for that being the elder born, he had been deprived of his inheritance by Aristobulus, and had onely but a small portion of the countrey allotted him, because Aristobulus had seized the rest by force. He complained likewise of those incursions, that both by land and sea Aristobulus followers had endamaged their frontiers with. For the people had not revolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accusation of his, a thousand of the principallest of the Jews (drawn on by Antipaters perswasion) subscribed, who averred and justified the same. But Aristobulus answered, that Hircanus was dispossessed of the kingdome, by reason of his incapacitie and naturall defects; alleading for himself, that the government was enforced on him by a necessitie, for fear it should be transported to others: in effect, he protested that he challenged no other Title, then that which his father Alexander had had. He brought in also for his witnesses certain arrogant young men, who were hated for their pomp, purple robes, their curiositie in painting and curling their hair, and bard horse, and other braveries which they presented, not like men that intended to expect judgement, but as if their pretence had been to make shew of their pomp. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemned Aristobulus violence, but for that time he dismissed them (after some favourable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their countrey, and determine their differences, after he had seen the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the mean-while to live in peace. He used Aristobulus likewise very kindly, fearing lest he should incense the people, and shut up his passage: which notwithstanding came to passe. For Aristobulus came into the citie of Delion, and from thence went into Judæa, without respect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

POMPEY maketh himself Lord of the Castles, by a warlike Stratagem.

POMPEY hearing this, was sore displeased herewith, and taking with him his army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damasco, and the rest of Syria, besides the other Romane companies that he had) he marched forth against Aristobulus: when as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behinde him, he came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Judæa) drawing toward the heart of the countrey. There found he a goodly Castle situate upon the top of a mountain called Alexandriion, whither Aristobulus was retired. For which cause he sent Embassadors to invite him to come and parlee with him: who perswaded by the counsell of many many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre against the Romans, came down unto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Castle. Mean-while he retired himself, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the warre, for fear lest Pompey should transferre the kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he should deliver up the fortresses that he held, and had written with his own hand to the Captains of the garrisons (who otherwise would not have obeyed him) Aristobulus submitted, and in discontent repaired to Jerusalem, with full intent to prepare for warre. POMPEY taketh the Temple, and lower part of the Citie perforce.

BUT within the City, there grew a division and faction, by reason of the difference and dissident opinions of those that kept the same; for some thought good to yeeld up the City into Pompeys hands; other some (that were of Aristobulus faction) counselled that the gates should be kept shut, and preparation for warre should be made, for that the Romans detained Aristobulus prisoner. These latter prevailing more then the rest, seized the Temple: and breaking down the bridge which was betwixt it and the City, addressed themselves to stand on their defence. But the others not onely delivered the City into Pompeys hands, but the royall palace also: who sent Piso his Lieutenant thither with his forces to take possession thereof, and to plant his garrisons therein, and to fortifie the houses neer adjoining the Temple, and whatsoever convenient habitation without the walls. First therefore Piso offered the besieged certain conditions of peace: which for that they refused, he fortified and shut them in on every side, being in all these his endeavours assisted by Hircanus. On the outside of the Citie, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the Temple (which was the easiest and meetest side to be assaulted) on this side also there were certain high towers, and a huge trench, besides a deep valley that begirt the temple. For towards the city all waies and passages were so broken up, that no man could either go up or down, and the bridge was taken away on that side where Pompey was incampd. Each day did the Romans travell earnestly to raise a mount, and cutting down all the timber round about them, and having fitly applied the same, the trench being fild up (although very hardly, by reason of the incredible depth thereof) the Rammes and Engines that were brought from Tyre were addressed, with which they inforced and darted stones against the Temple: and had not the ordinance of the countrey commanded to keep the Sabbath (which was the seventh day of the week) holy, and to labour in no sort on that day, the Romans had never been able to have raied their bulwark, if they within the temple had had opposed themselves against them. For the law permitteth to defend themselves against their enemies, at such time as they are assailed and urged to fight, but not assaile them when they intend any other work. Which when the Romans understood, they neither gave assault, nor proffered skirmish on those daies, which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, & planted their engines, so that the next day they were ready to put them in use against the Jews. And hereby it is easie to conjecture, how incredible the piety of our nation is, and how studious and industrious they be in observing the divine laws. For notwithstanding any present or imminent feare, yet desisted they never to offer their solemne sacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth houre, the Priests offered upon the altar; and notwithstanding any difficultie or danger of the siege that might happen, they omitted not the course of their oblations. For at such time as the temple was taken (in the third moneth, and on a fasting day, in the hundreth seventy nine Olympiade, in the yeer wherein Cajus Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Consuls) the enemy entred the temple by force, and slew those that withstood them. Yet notwithstanding all this, the Priests ceased not to exercise their accustomed sacrifice: and neither the hazard of their lives, nor the great number of those that were dead, could force them to flie; but that they held it more convenient for them to indure all things that might happen in attending upon the Altar, then to transgresse or vary one jot from their ordinances. And that this may seem to be no fable, or praise of their dissembled devotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all those that write the Histories concerning Pompey and his acts, doe witnesse no lesse: amongst the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Livius the Roman Historiographer, the most famous amongst the rest. The greatest of those towers was battered by these engines, and fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it, which was the cause that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The first that ascended the wall, was Cornelius Faustus the sonne of Sylla, with his souldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with those that followed him, on the other side: and thorow the midst of the breach, did the Centurion Fabius enter with a strong squadron. The whole circuit was filled with murthers; and some of the Jews died by the Romans swords; other some slew one another, the rest cast themselves down headlong from the steeple places: many likewise set fire on their houses, and consumed themselves therein, for feare they should behold the executions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelve thousand Jews, and very few Romans. Abisalom also, who was Aristobulus father in law, and uncle, was taken prisoner. The religion of the Temple likewise was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophan man either entred or beheld that which was in the temple, Pompey and divers others that accompanied him, entred the same, and saw that which was not lawfull to be beheld by any other but the high Priests onely. But although he found a table of gold, and a sacred candlestick, with divers other vessels and odoriferous drugs in great quantitie; and whereas besides that, there was about two thousand talents of silver in the sacred treasury in the Temple: yet touched he nothing thereof through the reverence he had of G O D; and herein he behaved himselfe answerably to his other vertues. The next day he commanded those that had the charge of the Temple, to purge the same, & to offer sacrifices unto God, according to the law; committing the high Priesthood to Hircanus hands, both for that he had stood him in great stead in many things, as for that he had hindred the Jews, that were of the countrey, from joyning themselves with Aristobulus. After this, he beheaded the authors of this warre, and honoured Faustus and the rest with condigne gifts, who with great courage had first attempted and ascended the wall. As for Jerusalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Jews those Cities they had conquered in Coelosyria, and assigning them a proper and peculiar government. After this, he inclosed the nation within certain limits, whereas before time their dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, he repaired Gadara, that not long before was destroyed: all which he performed in favour of Demetrius the Gadarenian his late servant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Marissa, Azot, Iamnia, and Arethusa, he restored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were situate in the heart of the land: Besides, Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton (cities situate upon the sea-coast, and ruinated before-times with divers warres) he set at libertie, and annexed them unto the province. As for the tower of Straton, it was magnificently builded by Herod, and decked with gates and faire Temples, & the name therof was changed, and called Cæsarea. Thus Hircanus & Aristobulus, through their dissentions and civill broyles, were the cause of that servitude and misery that fell upon the Jews. For we have lost our libertie, and have been subdued by the Romans. Besides that, we have been enforced to surrender up those cities unto the Syrians, which we beforetime

many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre against the Romans, came down unto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Castle. And this did he two or three times, alwayes flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the kingdome, and making a shew that he would be obedient unto him in whatsoever he would command. Mean-while he retired himself, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the warre, for fear lest Pompey should transferre the kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he should deliver up the fortresses that he held, and had written with his own hand to the Captains of the garrisons (who otherwise would not have obeyed him) Aristobulus submitted, and in discontent repaired to Jerusalem, with full intent to prepare for warre. Not long after this, when as Pompey marched towards him with his army, certain messengers coming from Pontus, certified him of Mithridates death, who was slain by his sonne Pharnaces.

At that time Aristobulus (being sorry for his misbehaviour) came unto him, offering him money: and promising him to receive him into Jerusalem, he besought him, that (dismissing publike enmities and quarrels) he would peaceably do what him listed hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condescended to his request, and sent Gabinus with his souldiers, both to receive the money, as also to enter the Citie; but his purpose failed him in both: for Gabinus returned, because he was excluded out of the Citie, neither received he any money, for that Aristobulus souldiers would not permit that any promise should be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth, so that after he had committed Aristobulus to prison, he went in person against the Citie, which was strongly fortified on every side, except toward the quarter that extendeth Northward, which was easie to be beaten down: for this side is invironed with a large and deep valley, compassing the Temple, which is inclosed with a marvellous strong wall of stone.

After that Pompey had given Coelosyria to Scaurus, from Euphrates as far as to the frontiers of Egypt, with two legions of the Romans, he went into Cilicia, and from thence drew towards Rome, leading with him Aristobulus in bonds, and his children (who were two sons, and two daughters) one of which called Alexander, escaped by flight; and as touching Antigonus (who was the younger) he was led to Rome with his sisters.

Castles fortified.

NOT long after this, Alexander Aristobulus son, made divers inroads into Jewry: for which cause Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things worthy of memory which he atchieved) he led forth his army against Alexander, for that Hircanus had not as yet sufficient power to resist him, being otherwise exercised in building the wals of Jerusalem that were beaten down by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans that were in Jewry hindred him from performing the same. This Alexander travelling thorow the whole countrey, assembled divers Jews; so that in short time, having gotten together 10000. footmen, and fiftene hundred horse with good munition, he fortified the Castle of Alexandrion neer unto the city of Coreas. He fortified Machæron also in the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth against him, having sent before him Marcus Antonius accompanied with other Chieftains of war, who armed the Romans of their train, and the Jews that were under their obedience, whose Captains were Pitholaus and Malichus. They took also those allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage came they to make head against Alexander. Gabinius also seconded them with his troupes. Hereupon Alexander drew more neer with his army towards Jerusalem, where waging battel with the Romans, he lost about three thousand of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away prisoners. After this, Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and invited those that held the same to depart, promising them pardon for the Rebellion they had begun. And whereas many of his enemies had encamped themselves before the Fort, the Romans charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius was adjudged to have behaved himself very valiantly, in that he slew divers of his enemies. Gabinius left a part of his army in that place, to the end that during the siege thereof, he might goe and visit the countrey of Judæa: he commanded therefore all those Cities, which in his journey he found either desolate or destroyed, to be repaired: for that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa and Gaza, with divers others, were new builded: so that through the obedience that was given to Gabinius command, it came to passe that the Cities were safely inhabited, which had laine long time before desart.

And after Gabinius had behaved himselfe in this maner in the countrey, he returned to Alexandrion. Whilest therefore he thus insisted about the siege, Alexander sent Embassadors unto him demanding pardon at his hand for his offences, and restoring into his hands the Castles of Hircania and Machæron, and finally that of Alexandrion, which Gabinius levelled with the ground. And whereas Alexanders mother came unto him (who favoured the Ro-

A man faction, and whose husband and children were kept in prison in Rome) she obtained all that which she requested at his hands: and after he had carefully and friendly disposed of her affairs, he led Hircanus to Jerusalem to take charge of the temple and Priesthood. He ordained also five judgement seats and places of session, and divided the province into answerable parts: for the one answered in Jerusalem; the second at Gadara; the third in Amatha; the fourth at Jericho; and the fifth at Saphora; which is a town of Galilee. By this means the Jews were delivered of their Monarchie, and lived under an Aristocracie, or government of the Nobilitie.

CHAP. XI.

ARISTOBULUS escapeth out of prison, and flieth from Rome, and is apprehended again by GABINIUS in Iudaea, and led back prisoner to Rome.

BUT Aristobulus flying from Rome, returned to Jewrie, and determined to re-edifie the Castle of Alexandrion, which not long since was ruinated. Against him Gabinus sent out certain men of war with their Captains, namely Sisenna, Antonius and Servilius, both to keep him from the possession of the place, as to apprehend and surprize him likewise. For many Jews resorted unto him, being drawn thereunto by the ancient reputation that he had: who desired likewise to work innovations. Pistholus also (who was established Lieutenant Generall in Jerusalem) of his own accord came unto him, with a thousand men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the most part were not sufficiently furnished with arms; for Aristobulus making his reckoning to seize Machæron, dismissed those followers of his that were disarmed, and were unapt for any execution, and retaining onely eight thousand well armed men, he took the field and marched thither. But the Romans pursuing and overtaking him, fought desperately with him, and overcame both him and his, notwithstanding their valiant resistance. Being therefore forced by the enemies, they were put to flight, and about five thousand of them were slain; and the rest dispersed, wandring here and there, fought for their own private securities: but Aristobulus fled to Machæron with more then a thousand followers, and fortified the place. And though his affairs had very slender successe; yet lost he not his hope: but after he had endured the siege some two dayes, and received many wounds, he was taken prisoner, and with his sonne Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away captive by Gabinus. Such was the adventure of Aristobulus, that he was sent prisoner back again to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had been King and high Priest three years, and sixe moneths. A man in that dignitie both magnificent & magnanimous: yet did the Senate send back his children (according to the tenor of Gabinus letters) who had promised their delivery to their mother, at such time as she surrendred the Castles into his hands: whereupon they returned into Jewry. But Gabinus, intending to make warre against the Parthians, and having already past Euphrates, changed his resolution, and determined to return into Egypt, and reestablish Ptolomey, as it is declared in an other place. In this expedition also he was furnished by Antipaters means, with victuals, money and munition; and by his advice, those Jews that inhabite Pelusium (who kept as it were the very entry into Egypt) were drawn into his societie. When as therefore Gabinus returned back out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of tumult and rebellion. For Alexander, Aristobulus son, taking once more possession of the kingdom, caused divers Jews from day to day to revolt; and forraging the countrey with a huge army, he slew all those Romans whom he met with all, and besieged all those that fled into the mount Garizim. Gabinus seeing the affairs of Syria in that estate, sent Antipater before him unto them to appease these commotions, and to heale them of their frenzie, and if it were possible to reduce them to a better minde: for Antipater was a man of good discretion. In effect, he repairing unto them, moderated divers of them, and brought them under obedience: but it was impossible for him to reconcile Alexander, for he having thirty thousand souldiers with him, came forth to meet with Gabinus, with whom he fought, and was overcome, with the losse of some ten thousand of his men, neer unto the mount Itabyr.

After that Gabinus had ordered all things in Jerusalem by Antipaters advice, he presently set forward against the Nabathæans, whom he overcame in battell. He sent back also Mithridates and Orsanes (men of good reckoning among the Parthians) who had retired themselves unto him, causing a bruit to be spread, that they were fled with Gabinus. Now when Gabinus had performed great and magnificent exploits in war, he returned to Rome, surrendering the government to Crassus. Nicholas Damascene, and Strabo of Cappadocia (who differeth in nothing from Nicholas) have written of these expeditions of Pompey and Gabinus in Judæa.

Crassus breaketh his oath.
Whence the Temple of Jerusalem grew so rich.
Strabo of Cappadocia.

CRASSUS intending to make warre against the Parthians, came into Jewry, and took away with him the sacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the sum of 2000. talents:) He spoiled the Temple also of all the gold that was in the same, to the summe of 8000. talents. Furthermore, he bare away a wedge of solid gold, to the weight of three hundred pounds, which pound amongst the Jews containeth two pounds and a halfe. He that delivered him this ingot was a Priest, and the keeper of the sacred treasure, called Eleazar, who gave him the same upon no malicious intent (for he was a vertuous and just man) but whereas he had the custodie of the tapestries of the Temple, committed to his hands (which were both admirable to behold, by reason of their beauty and esteeme, and withall were in like sort tied and fastned to his beame) and perceiving that Crassus sought all the means that in him lay, to gather all the money he could, he fearing lest he should have seized on all the ornaments of the temple, gave him this beame for a rancome to redeeme all the rest: binding him upon the delivery thereof by an oath, that he should not take any thing away that was in the temple, but should content himself with that onely piece of great esteeme and value, which he gave him. This beam was inclosed in another hollow beam of wood, so that no man knew thereof but onely Eleazar. Crassus therefore took this beam, as if he determined to leave all other things in the temple; yet notwithstanding he falsified his oath, and carried away whatsoever was therein. Neither is it to be wondred at, that there was so great riches found in our temple, sith all those Jews that were dispersed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all those that feared God (both in Asia and in Europe) for a long time offered their presents in that place. The greatnesse and multitude whereof wanteth no testimony: neither is it fained in way of ostentation, but divers other Historians make mention thereof: and amongst the rest, Strabo of Cappadocia speaketh after this maner: And Mithridates sent men into the Ile of Coos, to fetch from thence the money that Queen Cleopatra had laid up there, and 800. talents of the Jews. But we have no publike money, but that which is dedicated unto God. It is therefore a thing most manifest, that the Jews that inhabit Asia, transported this money into Coos for the fear they had of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they, who inhabited Judæa, and had a Citie so strong, and a temple so well defenced, should send their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewise, that the Jews remaining in Alexandria should doe it, for that they feared not to fall into danger through this war of Mithridates. The same Strabo also saith in another place, that at such time as Sylla passed thorow Greece to make warre against Mithridates and Lucullus, he sent men unto Cyrene, which was troubled by reason of the mutinies of our nation, wherewith the whole world was filled, and saith thus: There were foure sorts of people in the Citie of the Cyrenians: One of them were Citizens; the second were Labourers; the third were Sojourners; and the fourth were Jews, who at this present are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place thorowout the world, neither was there any nation that inhabit the same, wherein these have not set foot and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being under the subjection of the same Princes) and divers other regions, conformed themselves to their customes, and nourished assemblies of Jews, and advanced them, and more and more used the Jewish ordinances. It appeareth therefore that there was a colony of Jews in Egypt. Furthermore, in Alexandria a great part of the city is assigned to this nation. They have likewise their peculiar magistrate, who governeth the people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordinances, as if he governed in his own common weale. By this means this nation hath fortified and established it selfe in Egypt, for that the Jews had their originall amongst the Egyptians, and for that Judæa is neer unto Egypt, from whence the Jews are descended: And as touching Cyrene, they have entred it, in that it confineth that countrey, which is under the obedience of the Egyptians (in like maner as Judæa doth) or rather for that in times past it pertained to the same kingdome. Thus farre Strabo.

Crassus slain in Parthia.
Crassus resisteth the Parthians.

After that Crassus had disposed all things according to his own pleasure, he dislodged and marched forward to make war against the Parthians, where both he and all his army were destroyed (as it is declared in another place.) As for Cassius, he retired himself into Syria, and took possession thereof, to the end he might affront the Parthians, who being proud of their victory victory lately obtained, made excursions so far: and coming to Tyre, he finally arrived in Judra, where upon his first entrance he took the citie of Tarichæa, and led away from thence thirty thousand prisoners. He put Pitholam also to death, for that he maintained Aristobulus faction. All which he did by Antipater's procurement and instigation, who was in great credit with him, & who also at that time was highly esteemed amongst the Idumæans: amongst whom he married his wife, who was descended of one of the most famous families of Arabia, her name was Cyran, by whom he had these four sons: Phasalus and Herod (who after was made King), Ioseph and Pheroras; and one daughter called Salome. This Antipater also made alliance with other Princes, and especially with the Arabian, to whose custodie he committed his children, during the time he made warre against Aristobulus. But Cassius gathered another army, and marched towards Euphrates to make head against the Parthians, as it is specified and registred by other Writers.

After this, Cæsar (being Lord of Rome) after that Pompey and the Senate were fled on the other side of the Ionian Sea, set Aristobulus at libertie, determining to send him into Syria, with two legions; as being a sufficient man to govern the State affairs in that quarter. Nevertheless, Aristobulus failed of his hopes and authoritie he expected at Cæsars hands: For Pompey's partakers prevented and poysoned him, where through he died, so that he was buried by those of Cæsars faction. His body was kept embalmed with honey for a long time, untill that Antoninus sent it into Jury, to be entombed amongst the Kings and Princes.

Scipio, by Pompey's commandement, caused Alexander Aristobulus's sons head to be cut off, charging him with some misdemeanors which he had committed against the Romans, and after this manner finished he his dayes being executed in Antioch. Ptolomey the son of Meneas, who governed in Chalcis (at the foot of the mount Libanus) took his brothers, and sent his sonne Philippian to Ascalon to Aristobulus's wife, commanding her to send her sonne Antigonus and his daughters, one of which, called Alexandra, was beloved by Philippian, and married by him: but afterwards he being slain, Pompey Philippian's father married her, and continued the carefull maintenance of his brethren in law.

CAESAR'S voyage into Egypt, wherein he was assisted by the faithfull.

After Pompey's death, and that victory which Cæsar had obtained against him, Antipater (Governour of Judra by the commandement of Hircanus) was very profitable unto Cæsar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamentian brought him certain supplies, and could not bring them on, by reason of an arme of Nilus passing thorow Pelusium; but was constrained to stay at Ascalon: Antipater came unto him, and brought with him three thousand souldiers, and so dealt with the Princes of Arabia to associate them with Cæsar, that by his means, all they of Syria gave him their assistance, and never altered their affection that they bare unto Cæsar. These were Iamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolomey his sonne, and Tholomeus the sonne of Sohemus dwelling on the mount of Libanus, and well nigh all the Cities. Mithridates being departed from Syria, came to Pelusium, where being repulsed and excluded by the Citizens, he besieged the city. Antipater in this war behaved himself valiantly, and after he had beaten down a pane of the wall, he first of all set forward to enter the Citie. Whilest Pelusium was in this estate, the Jews that inhabited Egypt in the countrey of Onias, would neither grant passage to Antipater, nor Mithridates that marched towards Cæsar. But Antipater, who was of their nation, perswaded them to take their parts, shewing them the letters of the high Priest Hircanus, in which he invited them to be friends unto Cæsar, and exhorted them to furnish his army in whatsoever they stood in need of: so that seeing that Antipater and the high Priest were accorded together, they submitted themselves. They that dwelt round about Memphis, hearing that they were thus united, sent for Mithridates also unto them, who came and received them into his favour.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 17. al 18. Hircanus by Caesars permission repairth the walls of Jerusalem. The Senates Decree as touching their league with the Jews.

When he was come to a place called Delta, he fought with the enemies in a place, which is called The campe of the Jews: in which battel Mithridates led the right wing, and Antipater the left. When as therefore they came to handy blows, Mithridates wing retired and fainted, and grew in danger to be wholly discomfited, had not Antipater (running with his souldiers along the bank of the river) obtained the upper hand of his enemies, by putting the Egyptians that were conquerors to flight, and restoring Mithridates. And so long pursued he them, that he got their camp, and called back Mithridates, who chased the Egyptians, to take part of the prey with him, that he had recovered from the fugitive enemy. In this fight there fell 800. on the enemies side, and 50. on Antipaters. Afterwards, Mithridates wrote hereof unto Caesar, and certified him that Antipater was cause of the victory, and their preservation: so that Caesar from that time forward highly commended him, and in all his war made he use of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts: Whereby it came to passe that Antipater was grievously wounded in divers fights.

Now after that the war was finished, Caesar sailed into Syria, and bestowed great honours as wel on Hircanus, to whom he confirmed the high Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free citizen of Rome, and granted him full exemption of all charges in all places. Divers men report that Hircanus himselfe was an agent in this warre, and that he came into Egypt: whereunto accordeth Strabo the Cappadocian, speaking after this maner by the authoritie of Asinius; after that Mithridates had entred Egypt, with Hircanus the high Priest of the Jews. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authoritie of Hypsicrates, that Mithridates issued alone; and that Antipater was sent for into Ascalon, where he prepared three thousand souldiers, because he was governour of Judaea, and encouraged the rest of the Governours; and Hircanus the high Priest also had a part in this war. Thus far Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus sonne, to Caesar, lamenting unto him the inconvenience that had befallen his father, and how he was slain by poyson in his service, and how his brother had his head strooken off by Scipio; beseeching him to have compassion of him, who was excluded and thrust out of the kingdome. He accused Hircanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannicall and violent government over their nation, and injuries offered to himselfe. Antipater being at that time present, answered for himselfe in those points wherein he was accused, declaring that Antigonus and his friends were factious and seditious men, protesting for himselfe how much he had travelled, and how many exploits he had executed in the late warre, whereof Caesar himselfe was a witnesse. Moreover, he avowed that Aristobulus had been justly led twice into captivitie to Rome, for that he had been alwaies an enemy, and no waies well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, he averred that he was justly punished by him, for his Latrocinies, and not injuriously & outrageously as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Caesar declared Hircanus high Priest, and gave Antipater any government whatsoever best him liked: who according to his choice, was appointed Perfect in Judaea.

CAESARS Letters, and the Senates Decree as touching their amitie with the Jews.

Moreover Caesar permitted Hircanus to repaire the wals of Jerusalem (according to his humble suit.) For after that Pompey had beaten them down, they lay levelled with the earth; and he commanded the Consuls at Rome, that this Decree should be registred in the Capitol. The example of which ordinance of the Senate containeth matter to this effect; Lucius Vaderius the sonne of Lucius the Pretor, hath related to the Senate (assembled in the temple of Concord the 13. day of December) in the presence of L. Caponius the sonne of Lucius, and Caius Papyrius Quirinus; the requests made by Alexander the son of Iason, Numenius the sonne of Antiochus, and Alexander the sonne of Dorcas, Embassadors in the behalfe of the Jews, men of good regard, and our allies, and promoted by them in renewing the ancient favours they have received from the Romans: and testimony of the confederation; have brought us a viall and buckler of gold

A gold of fifty thousand crowns price; requiring our letters might be given them, addressed to the free cities and the kings our confederates, to grant them passage thorow their countries and ports with all securitie, and without any offence. And we have thought good to make friendship and alliance with them, and to grant them all that which they require, in accepting the buckler brought by them. This hapned in the time that Hircanus was high Priest and Prince, and in the ninth year of his principedome, in the moneth of July.

Hircanus was in like sort honoured by the people of Athens, for many commodities and friendships that they received at his hands. They sent him also a decree which they ratified in his behalfe, the tenor whereof ensueth: The year wherein Dionysius the sonne of Asclepiades was Governour, and Priest, in the moneth of July, and on the 20. day this arrest or decree of the Athenians was delivered to the Governours by the Pretor Agathocles. Eucles the son of Menander the Alimufian hath written in the eleventh of March in the assembly generall; and placed it in the Theater, and the suffrages were gathered by Dorotheus the high Priest, with the chiefe assistants of the people. Dionysius the sonne of Dionysius published the same: Since that Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, the high Priest and Prince of the Jews, continueth his good affection towards all the people, and in especiall towards every citizen of Athens, and hath shewed them many friendships, receiving with all humanity those Athenians that come unto him, whether they resort thither as Embassadors, or for any other particular occasion whatsoever, and sendeth them back after they have provided them of safe conduct, whereof we have heretofore had testimony by the report of Theodotus, the sonne of Theodorus Simens; who hath made recitall unto the people of his worthinesse, and of the will he hath to doe us all the good that is possible. We have thought good to honour him by sending him a crown of gold in testimony of his courtesies, according to our custome and law; and by erecting a brazen statue unto him in the temple of Demus, and the Graces: Our will is also that this be proclaimed by a Herald in the Theater, during the Bacchanals, and at such time as the new Tragedies are plaid. Likewise in the solemnities Panathean and Eleusynian, and at the publike exercises: We will also that the Governours provide, that all that which we have advised for the honour, favour, affection and good wil towards this man, as he hath well deserved, be diligently performed; to the end that thereby it may appeare how our nation reward, and entertain such men as are vertuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart unto him, may provoke others to be the better affected toward us. It is likewise decreed, that amongst all the Athenians there be certain Embassadors chosen, who shall beare this Decree unto him, and exhort him to doe whatsoever is profitable for our common good, seeing himself so much honoured by us. Let this suffice to expresse the honours bestowed on Hircanus by the people of Rome, and the Citizens of Athens.

After that Cesar had given order for the affairs of Syria, he returned back by sea. And as soon as Antipater had brought Cesar out of Syria, he returned into Judæa, and suddenly builded up the wals which were before time defaced by Pompey; and in riding circuit about the country, he pacified the troubles, not onely by menaces, but by counsels also which he gave every one to live in peace; certifying them that if they submitted themselves to Hircanus their Prince, they should live happily, and enjoy their possessions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to advance themselves by any new commotion (supposing by that means to profit themselves some way) they should feele that in stead of a governor, they had a master; and in stead of a king, they should finde Hircanus a tyrant; and instead of the Romans and Cesar to be their Governours, they should feele and finde them to be their most hatefull enemies, for that they would not suffer, that any thing should be altered that they had established. By these and such like admonitions, he kept and continued all the country in peace.

ANTIPATER committeth the government of Galilee to his sonne HEROD, and that of Jerusalem to PHASAEUS his other sonne: and how SEXTUS CAESAR advanced HEROD to great honours and dignities.

ANTIPATER perceiving that Hircanus was slow and idle, he declared and appointed Phasaelus his eldest sonne governour over Jerusalem, and the country thereabout: As for Herod (who was very young, for he was not at that time above fifteen years old) he committed Galilee unto his charge: who although he were young in years, yet did not his tender age any waies prejudice him, because he was of a noble spirit, and found out this sudden sudden occasion to expresse that vertue that was in him. For having apprehended Ezechias, G who was the Prince of those theeves, who ranged over all Syria a long time with a great troupe of outlaws, he put him to death with divers of his complices. Which act of his got him no little estimation and credit among the Syrians: for by that means he rid their countrey of all those robbers, according as they desired. He was therefore praised thorow the villages and Cities for this act, as he that had given them peace, and assured possession of their citates. For this cause he was made known to Sextus Cesar, who was uncle to Cesar the great.

Furthermore his brother Phasalus was incited to follow his noble actions, and inforced himself to obtain no lesse reputation then he had; for which cause he strove to get the good will of the common people in Jerusalem, and governed the Citie with such discretion, that he acted all things to each mans content, and abused not his power to any private mans injurie: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole nation, with no lesse respect then if he had been their onely Lord and Sovereign. Yet did not this eminencie of estate so farre distract him, that he forgot the love and dutie he ought to Hircanus (asin such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding divers of the greatest amongst the Jews (seeing Antipater and his sonnes so highly advanced both by the publike favour of the whole nation, as also by the revenues, that they drew both out of Jewry, as also by the employment of Hircanus money) were grievously incensed against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperours of Rome, and having perswaded Hir-canus to send them money, he had appropriated the same unto himselfe, sending it not in Hir-canus name, but in his own; which though Hircanus knew, yet was he not moved therewith, I but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the Princes of the Jews was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who governed after a royall and tyran-nicall maner: For this cause they addressed themselves to Hircanus, and accused Antipater openly. How long (said they) will you dissemble and wink at those things that are daily practised? see you not that Antipater and his sonnes possesse in effect the royall power and authoritie of the kingdome, and that you have onely the name? Assure your selfe that you are not out of danger in contemning thus both your selfe and your kingdome. For Antipater and his sons are not now your substitutes, neither intend they your profit, or yong countries good (whatsoever your opinion is of them) but they openly are known for Lords and K Commanders. For Herod (Antipaters son) hath already put Ezechias & his complices to death, and thereby transgressed our laws, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked soever he be) except he be first of all condemned to death by the councill: and notwithstanding this, he hath been so bold, as to do justice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew wroth (for their mothers, whom Herod had slain, had incensed him by their continual exclamations in the temple, exhorting the King and people to call Herod to account before the councill of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus moved by these women, called Herod to answer unto those accusations which were objected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to present himself after the the maner of a private person, but well attended and accompanied to withstand all inconveniences. After therefore he had taken order for the affairs in Galilee (according as he thought meet in his own discretion) and that he himselfe was sufficiently accompanied to make his voyage, with such a guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leave himselfe unsecured in danger, he resorted to Jerusalem. Furthermore, Sextus Cesar Governour of Syria wrote unto Hir-canus to absolve him, adding threats to his perswasions, if so be he should performe the contrary; which gave Hircanus occasion to deliver Herod in despite of the councill and their intent, the rather also for that he loved him as intirely as his soune. When as therefore Herod presented himselfe before the councill with his retinue, all of them were aston-nished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouthes to speak one word, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to doe. Now whilest they stood upon these termes, a certain man called Sameas, who was of upright conversation, and for this cause was not distracted with fear, arose and spake to this effect: Dread King, and you honourable assistants, I could never yet remember, that ever any man which was called in question to defend his cause before us, hath appeared in this equipage; & I suppose that none of you can say, that the like hath ever hapned: but whosoever cometh into this place to receive judgement, he presenteth himself with humilitie and fear, with a countenance prepared to implore mercy, having his haire long, and his garment black: but this gallant Herod accused of murder (and for this occasion called before us) who could imagine that he should appeare before us in a purple robe, having his haire trimmed, and besides that, a guard of armed men about him: with an intent that if we condemne him, according

A according to law, he may put us to death without law, that after he hath violated all right, he might escape and save himself. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, then of the law; but I accuse both you and the king, who have given him such assurance. Know therefore, that there is a sovereign God, that will one day punish both you and the king, and him whom you will deliver by the kings means. And so generally fell it out as he had said: For as soon as Herod had obtained the kingdome, he put all those of the councill to death, and Hircanus himself likewise, only Sameas was exempted: for he held him in great estimation, because of his wisdom and justice, and because that at such time as the City was besieged by Herod and Sosius, Sameas perswaded the people to receive Herod, telling them that by reason of their sinnes and offences, they might not escape from him; whereof we will speak in place convenient. Hircanus perceiving that the Judges were inclined to condemn Herod, deferred the sentence till the next day, and sent secretly unto Herod, counselling him to flie out of the Citie, assuring him that there was no other means to save his life. Thus posted he to Damasco (as if he had fled from the kings presence) and presenting himself before Sextus Caesar, after he had assured his person, he resolved with himself, that if the councill should call him once more to answer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the councill were displeased with Hircanus, and laboured to perswade him, that all these things tended to his destruction: which he well perceived, yet knew he not what to doe, he was so negligent and void of foresight.

When Sextus had made Herod Governour of Coelosyria (which estate he sold unto him for ready money) Hircanus was afraid lest Herod should make warre against him: neither passed there long time before the effect grew answerable to his fear. For Herod marched forth against him, with a great armie, supposing himselfe to be much wronged by the assignation he had sent him, and in that he was summoned to give a reason of his actions before the councill. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phasaelus came forth against him to hinder his approach towards Jerusalem, striving to appease his fury, and counselling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himselfe that he had threatned and affrighted Hircanus, he should not attempt any further against him, who had raised him to that high degree. They told him also, that it became him not onely to remember that he was cited to answer, but that he was absolved also, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreover, that he ought to think, that God governeth the balance of warre, and that the issues of battels is uncertain, and for that cause he ought not to expect the victory, if he made warre against the King who was his familiar, and from whom he had received farre more kindnesse, and no displeasure: who though he made some appearance and shadow of severitie, touching the accusation intended against him, yet notwithstanding it proceeded not so much from him, as from his evill counsellors. Herod in some sort pacified by these perswasions, obeyed his father, supposing that it sufficed him in regard of his future hopes, that he had given the people so large a testimony of his power. This was the estate of the Jews at that time.

But Caesar arriving at Rome, prepared himselfe to set saile towards Africk, with an intent to make warre against Scipio and Cato. To him Hircanus sent Embassadors, beseeching him to confirme the amitie and association that he had with him. But now at this present, I think it very convenient to declare all the prerogatives, and associations that the Romans and their Emperours made with those of our nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Asia and Europe have been well affected towards us, and have made great account of our valour and fidelitie. And although divers men lewdly affected towards us, beleeve not that which the Macedonians and Persians have written of us, because the same matters are not extant in all places, neither set down in publike writings, but onely amongst our selves & some Barbarians; yet is it manifest that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romans, which are manifestly affixed in publike places in Cities, as likewise at this present they are written in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Iulius Caesar, in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared unto the Jews that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein. And to the intent that these things may more manifestly appeare, I will propose the decrees of the Senate, and of Iulius Caesar, made in the favour of Hircanus and our nation. Caius Iulius Caesar Emperour, high Priest, Dictator the second Time, to the Governours, Senate and people of the Sidonians, Health: If you are well, we are in health, both our selves and our army. end it may be placed among publike monuments: and my will is, that it be engraven in a table of brasse, both in Greek and Latine letters; the tenour whereof is this that followeth: Because Hircanus Alexanders sonne the Jew, both at this present as also heretofore, as well in peace as in warre, hath expressed his fidelitie towards us and our estate, as divers Chieftains of our armies yeeld testimony of him; and for that in our last Alexandrine warre, he seconded us in the battell with fiftene hundreth men; and having been sent by us to Mythridates, hath surmounted all those of his company in valour. For these causes my will is that Hircanus Alexanders sonne and his successours, be Princes of the Jews: and further, that they continue alwaies in the high Priesthood, according to the ordinance and custome of their countrey: and that both he and his children be our associates; and be inrowled likewise amongst our chiefeft friends: and all that which appertaineth to the Priesthood, according to the ordinances of the Jews, be attributed to him and his. And if there happen any difference as touching the discipline of the Jews, our pleasure is, that it be determined by him. And as touching the munitions of warre, and the money to be levied for the entertainment of souldiers, we think it not meet that they should be charged. The Decrees made and granted by Caius Casar being Consull, are these:

That the sonnes of Hircanus be Princes over the nation of the Jews, and enjoy the places granted unto them. That the high Priest and Prince of the Jews give favour and aide unto those that are offended. That Embassadors be sent to Hircanus the sonne of Alexander high Priest of the Jews, to intreat of amity and association with us. That a brazen table be erected in the Capitol: and likewise at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Ascalon in the Temples, wherein shall be engraven the contents hereof in Roman and Greek letters, to the end that all the Treasurers that are in the Cities, and all other Magistrates may by this our Decree understand, that they are our friends, and that their Embassadors be entertained with kindnesse and presents, and that these Edicts be sent into all places.

Caius Casar Emperour, Dictator, Consull, for the good of the Senate and people of Rome, hath granted to the honour, vertue, and humanitie of Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, that both he and his children shall be high Priests in Jerusalem; and of the whole Nation, according to the Rites and Customes, whereby their ancestors have enjoyed the Priest-hood.

Caius Casar, Consull the fifth time, hath ordained that they shall inhabit Jerusalem, and build again the wals of the Citie; and that Hircanus (Alexanders sonne, the high Priest and Prince of the Jews) shall govern as best him liketh, and that every second yeer of their tribute, there be a Chore deducted out of the rent they owe, and that they be exempt from all other impositions, and tributes.

Caius Casar, twice Emperour, hath ordained, that the Jews shall contribute every yeer for their cities, except Joppe; he acquitteth them also every seventh yeer (which they call the yeer of rest) because that therein they neither reape, nor sow, neither gather the fruit of trees. His further pleasure is, that every second yeer, they bring their tributes unto Sidon, which shall be the fourth part of that which shall be sown; and besides this, that they pay the tenths to Hircanus & his sons, which they have paid to their Predecessours unto this day. Commanding that no man, whether he be Governour, Captain, or Embassador, or any other whatsoever he be, levie souldiers within the countrey of Judaea, or draw any thereout: neither exact any money, whether it be for garrisons in winter, or for any other cause, but that the Jews be exempt from all troubles in all places, and enjoy all that which sithence they have had, bought, and possessed. It is our pleasure also, that the citie of Joppe be under their government (which they have ever enjoyed since the beginning of their friendship with the Romans.) We further grant, that Hircanus Alexanders sonne and his children, receive the tribute of that citie (both by them, that till the land, as by the gates, entries, and issues of merchandizes that are transported unto Sidon) twentie thousand, six hundreth, seventie and five bushels every yeer, exempting the seventh yeer, which is called the yeer of rest, wherein they neither labour nor gather any fruit of the trees. It is the Senates pleasure also, that Hircanus and the Jews have those villages, which are in the great champain, which he and his predecessors have possessed, and that with the like interests that they held them before this; and that the same customes continue therein, whereby they held and governed them. Their will is likewise, that the same lawes which have from the beginning been respectively observed between the Jews, and their high Priests, be continued; and whatsoever benefits were granted them, by the consent of the Senate and people of Rome. Moreover it shall be lawfull

A full for those of Lydda, to use the same rites and priviledges also. And as touching the demaies places, and habitations that have appertained to the Kings of Syria and Phœnicia, by the gift made unto them at such time as they were allied to the Romans: the Senate (I say) ordaineth; that Hircanus the high Priest and Prince of the Jews possesse the same. It is lawfull also for Hircanus and his sons, and their Embassadours sent by them, to behold the Jufts and Combates, and to sit among the Senators, and that at all and every time or times wherein they shall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the Master of the horse, they may have free entrance; and that within ten daies at the most they receive their answer, if there be any decree ratified by the Senate.

Caius Caesar, Emperour, the fourth time Consull, and the fifth time Dictator for terme of life, hath ratified these things, as touching Hircanus the sonne of Alexander, the high Priest and Prince of the Jews: Because that the Generals my predecessors have testified as well in the provinces, as before the Senate and people of Rome, both of the good deserts of Hircanus high Priest and Prince of the Jews, and that nation also, towards us and our State; and whereas both the Senate and people of Rome have gratified them for the same: we think it convenient also to have the same in memory, and to give order that Hircanus and his sonnes may be remunerated by the Senate, and people of Rome, according to the measure of their loyalties and good deserts.

Julius Caius Caesar Roman Consull, to the Governours, Senate and people of Patras, Health: The Jews are come unto us to Delos, with some of the Colonies of their countrey-men in the presence of your Embassadours, and certifie us of a decree made by you, whereby you forbid them the practice and ancient use of their sacrifices and oblations: I think it not meet that you make any such decrees against our friends, and associates, neither that you forbid them to live according to their fashions and customes; or to imploy their purses together in furnishing their feasts and sacrifices, since in Rome it selfe they are not interdicted or forbidden to performe the same. For at such time as Caius Caesar Consull had prohibited by Edict, that in celebrating the Bacchanals, no one should dance about the citie; yet were the Jews alone exempted from this inhibition: and neither have they been prohibited to contribute, neither to banquet together. My self also in like case in the defence I have made to forbid all other sodalities, have excepted the Jews therein, and have given them leave and licence to assemble and demean themselves, according to the customes, ceremonies, and ordinances of their countrey. If therefore you have made any such decrees against our friends and associates, you shall doe well to disanull them, by reason of the vertue of the Jews, and the forwardnesse they have protested in performance of our service.

After Caius Caesar's death, the Consuls Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolabella, assembled the Senate, and having brought in Hircanus Embassadours, they declared their request, and contracted amitie with them: The Senate likewise ordained, that each thing should be granted them that they required. And Dolabella having received Hircanus Letters, sent them thorowout all Asia, to Ephesus (which is the Metropolitane City of Asia) in these termes: The Generall Dolabella to the Princes, Senate, and people of Ephesus, Health: Alexander the sonne of Theodore Embassadour to Hircanus the high Priest and Prince of the Jews, hath given us to understand, that his subjects cannot goe on warfare, because it is not lawfull for them to bear arms, nor to travell on the Sabbath day; as also for that they may not seek for their victuals and other necessities on that day, according to the custome of their countrey: for this cause I grant them exemption from the warre, in like manner as my predecessors have done; permitting them to use the ceremonies and rites of their countrey, assembling themselves to make their oblations and sacrifices, as their laws and customes require, in contributing to the offering of the sacrifices in the Temple. And my will is, that you write to this effect to every citie of the Province. See here how Dolabella honoured Hircanus at such time as he sent his Embassadours unto him.

Lucius Lentulus Consull pronounceth that the Jews that are citizens of Rome, and that observe and offer the sacrifices of the Jews in Ephesus before the tribunall, be exempt from warfare, by reason of their religion. Given the nineteenth of October. There are besides these many other Edicts and Ordinances made to the like effect, by the same Generals, and by the Roman Senate in favour of Hircanus and our nation, and some other cities. In like sort there were divers decrees and writs sent unto the Governours and Rulers of the Provinces touching our priviledges: all which may be easily beleevd by those that shall reade our History, with no prejudicate opinion, if they consider those that we have here inserted. For we have shewed more expresse and lively testimonies of the friendship that we have had with the Romans, and such as at this day are affixed to pillars, and engraven in tables of bras.

in the Capitoll; and that hereafter shall remain affixed for ever: For which cause, I have thought it to be a frivolous and unnecessary matter to insert all in this place; and I think that there is not any man of so sinister judgement, that will not beleeve how much we have been esteemed by the Romans, as they have given testimonies by divers Decrees published in our behalfe; neither may any man suppose that we lie, considering the truth of that which we publish.

Thus have we sufficiently declared the amitie and association, that in times past we have had with the Romans. About this time it came to passe, that the estate of Syria was sore troubled upon the occasion that ensueth: Cæcilius Bassus one of Pompeys partakers, laid an ambush for Sextus Cæsar and slew him, and seizing upon his army, usurped the government: whereby there arose great war nigh Apamea. For Cæsars Captains marched out against Cæcilius, with great force both of foot and horsemen, to whom Antipater sent his sonnes with a power to second them (in remembrance of the benefits he had received at Cæsars hands) supposing it to be an act of justice, that the murdereth should be punished for his so hainous offence. Now whereas this war continued a long time, Marcus came and succeeded Sextus. Mean-while Cæsar was slain by Cassius and Brutus in the midst of the Senate, after he had commanded three yeeres and six moneths, as it is expressed in another place.

Cassius afflicteth the Jews, and exacteth about eight hundredth talents at their hands.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 20.
Cassius cometh into Syria, and exacteth more then 200. talents of silver from the Jews.
Herod winneth Cassius heart by the money he levieth in Galilee.

AFTER Cæsars death, the brand of civill warre began to flame, and the greatest men of Rome travelled the one this way, the other that way, to gather men of warre. But Cassius came into Syria, with an intent to take the armie that was neer to Apamea: and having levied the siege, he drew both Bassus and Marcus to be of his faction, and travelling from city to city, he gathered a number of souldiers, and much furniture, and imposed huge tributes: but especially he afflicted Jewry, and exacted of that countrey more then seven hundredth talents of silver. Antipater seeing the State in so great fear and trouble, committing the exaction of the two parts of this money to his sonnes; the other he commanded to be assigned to Malichus, who was his enemy, and the other part unto another. Herod first of all gathered that which was commanded him in the countrey of Galilee, and for this cause was greatly beloved by Cassius: for he being prudent and discreet, thought it no small policy at that time to win the Romans good will by other mens expence. Under the other governours the Cities were set to sale, together with their inhabitants: and amongst them these foure were the chiefeft, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Cassius sold the people thereof to them that would give most. Furthermore, Cassius was so much transported with choler, that he had slain Malichus (so much was he moved against him) if Hircanus had not restrained his fury, by sending him one hundredth talents of his own money by Antipater. But as soon as Cassius was departed out of the countrey of Judæa, he practised Antipaters death, supposing that his cutting off would assure Hircanus state the more strongly. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his resolution; for having an inkling thereof, he got himselfe on the other side of Jordan, and assembled an armie of souldiers both Jews and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politique and subtrill fellow) denied stoutly that he had intended any Treason, purging himselfe with an oath before Antipater and his children, that he had never any such intent, especially for that he saw that Phasalus held Jerusalem, and Herod had an armie at command. And in the end, perceiving the difficultie wherein he was, he reconciled himselfe to Antipater, and they agreed at that time that Marcus governed Syria: who perceiving that Malichus began to raise troubles in Jewry, resorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had slain him, had not Antipater by earnest request obtained his life.

CHAP. XIX.

Malichus poisoneth ANTIPATER.

Cassius and Marcus make Herod Governour of Cælosyria.

BUT imprudent Antipater saved Malichus to his own mischief: For when Cassius and Marcus had assembled their armie, they committed all the charge into Herods hands, and made him Governour of Cælosyria, and delivered him great forces both of foot and horse, and ships by sea: They promised him likewise the kingdome of Judæa, after they had

A had finished the war, that was at that time betwixt them and Anthony and Cesar the younger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power, determined to make him away; and having corrupted Hircanus butler with money (with whom both of them celebrated a feast) he made him away by poyson, and afterwards assembling many men of warre about him, he made himself master of the Citie. When Herod and Phaselus understood of the traitorous conspiracie attempted against their father, they were grievously incensed against Malichus. But he denied all, and in especiall abjured the intent or practice of the murther. Thus died Antipater a just and vertuous man, and such a one as dearly loved his countrey. But Herod, who was his younger sonne, incontinently resolved to revenge his fathers death, and came forth with an army against Malichus: But Phaselus, who was the elder, determined to circumvent him by policie, for fear lest he should raise a civill warre. He therefore accepted of Malichus justifications, and made a shew that he supposed that he had in no such sort sought Antipaters death, and onely intended his fathers monument and funerals. Mean while, Herod resorting to Samaria, and finding it in desperate estate, restored the same, and pacified the dissensions that were amongst the inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a feast) he came to Jerusalem with his men of warre. Whereupon Malichus being afraid of this his accessse, perswaded Hircanus that he should not permit him to enter into the City: whereunto Hircanus condescended, alleadging for pretext of his defence, that amongst the holy people it was not lawfull to intermix a troop of polluted men. But Herod made small reckning of them that brought him this news, and notwithstanding this command, entred the Citie by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his wonted dissimulations, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater as his especiall friend; but under hand he prepared a guard for his own safetie. Notwithstanding it was thought meet by Herods friends, to take no notice of this dissimulation; but to make a shew for their parts, that they were well-affected towards Malichus.

Malichus caused Antipater to be poisoned.

CHAP. XX.

D Whereupon Herod certified Cassius of Antipaters his fathers death, who knowing very well of what conversation Malichus was, wrote back unto Herod that he should revenge the death of his father: besides, he sent secret letters to the Captains that were in Tyre, commanding them to aid and assist Herod in that so just execution which he intended. After therefore that Cassius had taken Laodicea, and the inhabitants of the countrey came together, bringing with them crowns and silver to present him, Herod expected that Malichus in that place should receive his punishment: but he entring into suspicion of some practice, at such time as they drew neer unto Tyre in Phoenicia, attempted farre greater things. For whereas his sonne was an hostage in Tyre, he entred the Citie with intent to draw him thence, and afterwards to return into Judaea. After this, usurping upon that opportunitie which he had by reason of Cassius troubles (who hastily marched forward to meet with Anthony) he determined to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himself Lord of the countrey: but God disappointed his unjust purposes: For Herod being a man of a ripe judgement, incontinently discovered his pretence, and sent one of his servants before, as if under purpose to prepare a banquet, because he had told him beforetime that he would entertain all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the Captains to command them to issue out with their daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth and meeting him neer unto the shore of the City upon the sea coast, stabbed him in that place with their daggers. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that through amaze he waxed speechlesse: and finally being much moved, he demanded of Herods men, what accident had happened, and who it was that had slain Malichus? Whereof when they certified him, and how nothing was done without Cassius command: he answered that all things were well done, for that Malichus was a wretched man and a traitour to his countrey. See here how Malichus was justly punished for the wickednesse he committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was departed out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Judaea: for Felix, who was left in Jerusalem with an army, marched forth against Phaselus, and all the people were in arms. For which cause Herod speedily repaired to Fabius, Governour of Damasco, and intending to succour his brother, was prevented by a sicknes: so that Phaselus obtaining the victorie by his own forces against Felix, enclosed him up in a tower, whence afterwards he

he dismissed him under composition. Whereupon he presently and grievously rebuked Hircanus, for that being forgetfull of divers benefits which he had received by him, he had given aid unto his enemies. For Malichus brother being at that time revolted, planted garrisons in divers fortresses, and namely in Masada, which was the strongest of them all. As soon as Herod therefore had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces against him, and dispossessed him of divers places that he held, and after suffered him to depart with his life and goods.

When he was come to Jerusalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crowns: for already was he inserted into Hircanus family, for that by promise he was his sonne in law; by which means, he had more willingly undertaken his defence, for that he was to marry Alexanders the sonne of Aristobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whom he begat three sonnes and two daughters. Before her also had he married a wife of his own nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest sonne.

ANTONIUS* and Cæsar having overcome Cassius neer unto the city of Philippi, Cæsar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asia. And being in Bithynia, Embassadours resorted unto him from all parts: Thither also repaired certain principall men among the Jews to accuse Phasaelus and Herod, saying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdome. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came unto him to answer those accusations that they had imposed on him: for which cause they that were his opposites, could obtain no audience: for Herod had bought that priviledge from them with his money. As soon as Antonius was arrived in Ephesus, Hircanus the high Priest and all our nation presently sent an Embassadour unto him, with a crown of gold, requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Cassius had taken prisoners (contrary to the law of arms) might be set at liberty, and that their countrey (which was taken from them in Cassius time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demands which the Jews had proposed, were reasonable, wrote back presently to the high Priest Hircanus and the Jews; and sent an Edict also to the Tyrians to this effect:

“Marcus Antonius Emperour, to Hircanus high Priest and Prince of the Jews, Health: If you are well, all goeth well. I and mine army are in perfect estate. Lysimachus the sonne of Pausanias, and Ioseph the sonne of Mennæus, and Alexander the sonne of Theodore your Embassadours, came unto me to Ephesus, and have renewed the same Embassage which they heretofore brought to Rome, and at this present likewise they have duely and faithfully acquitted themselves of the Embassage which they present in the behalf of you, and your Nation, by giving us to understand what affection you bear towards us: so that I esteeme you for our friend, sith I am given to understand how friendly you have behaved your self towards us both in words and deeds, since we have had any knowledge of your good and honest conversation

A versation and pietie. For at such time as our adversaries and enemies of the Romane nation spoiled all the countrey of Asia, and without regard of their oaths spared neither Cities nor Temples; we have opposed our selves against them, not onely for our private respect, but in the quarrell of the common-weal, to the intent to punish the authors of such offences committed against men, and of such impieties perpetrated against God: for which we suppose that the Sunne hath in a maner obscured himself, by beholding with unwilling eyes what an hainous offence was committed against Cesar. But we have gotten the upper hand of their impious enterprizes, which are fallen upon Macedonia, as on the countrey and aire, from whence proceed such detestable and ungracious designs: and we have likewise cut off the course of their desperate resolution, which made them encounter us neer to Philippi a city of Macedonia, where we seized their places fortified by nature, and enclosed with mountains as if it were with walls, as farre as the sea, in such maner as the passage was barred up, as it were with a gate, had not the gods given us way by resisting their unjust exploits, and furthering ours. Brutus is likewise compelled to flie to Philippi, where being inclosed by us, he suffered the like ruin with his consort Cassius; and since they have been punished as they deserved, we seemeth that we are seized of peace, and that Asia hath had repose from warre, and all the body thereof is relieved from a grievous maladie, by the means of our victory. For which cause remembring us of you and your Nation, to the end to increase your good fortunes, we will bethink us of that which shall be commodious for you: and we have already sent letters from city to city, to the intent that if any one among you, either captive or free-man, have been sold to the utmost by Caius Cassius, or any of that army, they may be set at liberty. And our will is, that you make use of the bounty which we bestow upon you, both in our self as in Dolabella right, forbidding the Tyrians to molest you, and commanding them to restore all that which they have taken from the Jews in goods or possessions. As for the crown which you sent me, I accept the same.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Governours, Senate and people of Tyre, Health: I have been informed in Ephesus by Hircanus Embassadors (who is high Priest and Prince of the Jews) that you have seized their countrey, and spoiled the same, at such time as our adversaries held that Province. But in as much as we have undertaken the warre for the Empire, and that in defence of right and pietie, we have punished these ingratefull, disloyall and perfidious persons; our will is, that you suffer our allies to live in peace: and as touching that which you have obtained by our adversaries, our pleasure is, that you restore the same to those that are dispossessed. For no one of them hath obtained either Province or Armie by the consent of the Senate; but have ravished them by force, and afterwards bestowed them on those who have been ministers of their impieties and injustice. But since they have been punished according to their deserts, we require that our allies may enjoy their own, without any impeachment: and if you hold any places at this present, which belong to Hircanus Prince of the Jews (that were seized since the time that Caius Cassius by unjust warre invaded our Provinces) restore them unto him, without offer of any violence, to hinder him from the possession of his own. And if you have, or pretend to have any right in them; at such time as I shall repair to those places, it shall be lawfull for you to debate your right, and we will so judge, as that our allies shall receive no wrong.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Governors, Senate, and people of Tyre, Health: I have sent you my edict, which my pleasure is that you carefully look unto, and that you register it amongst your publike records in Roman and Greek letters, and set it up in writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all men.

Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumvir, in the presence of the Tyrians assembled for their publike affairs, hath declared, that Caius Cassius during the troubles, by the assistance of his souldiers, hath ravished another mans Province; and hath in like sort spoiled our allies, and hath ransacked the nation of the Jews, who are friends to the people of Rome: and for that by our valour we have repressed his insolence, by our edicts and judgements we will correct his offences; to the end that all things may be restored to our allies, and that all whatsoever hath been sold, and appertained to the Jews (whether they be prisoners or possessions) be restored to their masters, to the end that each man be at liberty as he was before, and that each mans possession may be restored to his first owner. And my pleasure is, that whosoever disobeyeth this ordinance, he may be punished. And he that shall be convicted to have disobeyed the same, he shall be punished according to his demerit. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Arabians; all which we will insert in a convenient place, to testify what account the Romans made of our nation.

Antonius maketh Phasaelus and Herod Tetrarchs.

A thousand Jews repair to Tyre to accuse Herod, who is partly slain, partly wounded, and partly put to flight.

The year of the world, 3925. before Christs Nativity, 39.

AFTER this, Antonius retired himself into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him neer unto Cilicia, and entangled him in her love. At that time also, 100. of the chiefest reckning among the Jews, came once again in Embassage to him to accuse Herod, and his adherents: who to this end had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise undertook the defence of the young men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied unto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the Citie of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties governed the common weal best? who returned him answer, that they, who were on Herods side, were most studious of the weal publike. Antonius (who long since had born good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitalitie that he had received with their father, during the time that Gabinus was in Judæa) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affairs in Judæa: And to this effect wrote he his letters, and committed fourteen of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herod besought for their lives, he had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soon as they returned from their Embassage, they could not contain themselves in quiet, but resorted once more unto Antonius to the number of ten thousand, to the city of Tyre where Antonius sojourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadors of the Jews should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innovation; where contrariwise he confirmed Herods government. At that time Herod, who walked by the sea side, came unto them, advising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to give over their appeal, for fear lest some grievous misfortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gave no regard, certain Jews and inhabitants of that Citie, all at once ranne upon them, who slew some of them, and hurt other some, and the rest taking their flight towards their countrey, ever afterwards contained themselves and lived in quiet, through the fear they had conceived. But when the people ceased not to exclaim and protest against Herod, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that he commanded all those whom he held prisoners, should be slain.

The year after, Pacorus the Kings sonne, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, invaded and seized Syria. And about this time died Ptolomey the sonne of Mennæus; and his sonne Lysias reigned in his stead, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus, who obtained this favour at his hands by the counsell and sollicitation of a certain Prince of great authority and credit with him.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Parthians make warre in Syria, to restore ANTIGONUS the sonne of ARISTOBULUS to his Kingdome.

AFTER this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to give them one thousand talents of silver, and five hundred women, if so be they would deprive Hircanus of the kingdome; and restore it unto him, and withall put Herod and his friends to death. Yet did he not deliver them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians led their army into Jewry to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the sea-coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolemaidans received him into their Citie. He sent a troop of horsemen into Jewry to discover the estate of the countrey, and to give succours to Antigonus. The chieftain of these horsemen was the Kings butler; who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certain Jews (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) joyned themselves with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to invade his enemies, he conceived some hope that he might by their means reduce a certain part of the region under his government, which is called Drymæ: and certain of his well-willers meeting him in the way, perswaded him to presse forward as farre as Jerusalem; where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they addresse themselves to assault the Kings palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was maintained in the market place, place, the young men repulsed the enemy, and drave him into the Temple. Which done, they sent certain armed men into the houses neer adjoyning, to guard them: but the people rushing in upon them, and seeing they were destitute of aid, burned both them and the houses wherein they were. But this iniquity of theirs was presently revenged by Herod, who in a skirmish that he had with them, slew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily assaults between both parties, the enemies expected untill such time as the people (assembled from all parts of the countrey) should repair to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast of Pentecost. Which being come, many thousands of men assembled about the Temple, both armed and unarmed, who seized both the Temple and the City: except the Kings house onely, which Herod made good with a few men of warre. The wall thereof did Phasaelus his brothers keep. But Herod with a company of his followers sallied out upon the enemy, who were planted in the suburbs, and fighting valiantly against them, he put divers thousands of them to flight, whereof some retired themselves into the Citie, other some into the Temple; the rest into a certain bulwark neer at hand. In this battell also Phasaelus shewed no little valour.

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians, came into the Citie with some few horsemen at Antigonus request, making shew that he came to appease the sedition; but the effect and scope of his coming was, to obtaine the soveraigntie for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phasaelus was come out to meet with him, and had courteously entertained him in his house, Pacorus perswaded him to goe Embassadour with him to Barzapharnes, laying a baite vnder this pretence to surprize him. He suspecting no treacheries, was easily perswaded, notwithstanding that Herod disliked the course, who knowing the perfidious maner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to assaile Pacorus, and to assault and oppresse his forces, when they were come unto him. Nevertheless Hircanus and Phasaelus undertook this Embassage, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod two hundred horsemen, and ten of those whom they call free-men) conducted the Embassadours. Now as soon as they came into Galilee, the governours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meet them: Barzapharnes also at the first gave them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with presents; but anon after, he began to practise treachery. For Phasaelus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adjoynd the sea, where hearing rydings that Antigonus had promised one thousand talents, and five hundred virgins to the Parthians, he began already to suspect the Barbarians. For a certain friend of his had given him an inkling that there were treasons intended against him that very night, and that his lodging was privily beset with a guard. And surely they had been surprised, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Jerusalem) should be seized of Herod, fearing lest he having an inkling of their dyfaster, should betake himself to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was set about them: For which cause there were certain of Phasaelus friends, who counselled him, that without any more delay, he should betake him to his horse, and flie from thence: and amongst the rest, Osilius was most earnest, who had wrought out of Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ships that road hard by to further their flight) all that which they pretended. But Phasaelus would neither forsake Hircanus, nor leave his brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to use these sinister practices against them. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receive it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howsoever he wrought, it was an intolerable injurie to put Embassadours to death, who came unto him under pledge of his honour, and had no wayes offended him. But the Barbarian hearing these things, protested by an oath, that no one point of that which he had suspected, was true; but that he was onely troubled with false surmize: whereupon he presently departed to Pacorus.

CHAP. XXV.

The Parthians lead away HIRCANUS and PHASAEUS into captivity.

AS soon as he was departed, certain of the Parthians took Hircanus and Phasaelus prisoners, who mightily detested their perjuries. But the Eunuch that was sent unto Herod, had commandment given him to entice and train him without the city walls, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certain messengers (who were sent by Phasaelus to give him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemy in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addressed himself to Pacorus (and

(and those in greatest authority among the Parthians) as to them that were the masters: who subtilly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him that he should do well to repair with them without the wall to go and meet those messengers, who brought him letters; who had not as yet been seized by their adversaries, but came to certify him of Phasaelus good estate. But Herod gave them no credit, because he was already otherways advertised of his brothers surprisall, and had also farre greater suspicion of the Parthians by the sollicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom he had married. And although the rest made no account of her advertisements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that she was a most wise woman. Now whilest the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open assault upon such a man) they deferred the whole matter untill the next morning. Whilest thus they were debating of their differences, Herod came unto them, who rather giving credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) then to his adversaries, as soon as it was night, concluded to make use of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those uncertain dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those men of warre which he had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister and his betrothed, whom he was to marrie (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Aristobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her younger brother, with all their family and train, he departed into Idumæa without espiall or suspicion of the enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard or iron-hearted, who seeing such a pitifull spectacle, could not be moved to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their countrey with tears and complaints: and that which was worse, to leave their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redresse.

Herod retiring towards Massada, is assailed by the Parthians.

The Parthians spoil the citizens of Jerusalem, and destroy Marissa.

But Herod mastered these misfortunes by his invincible courage, and for that he was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themselves to immeasurable sorrow, for that by such means they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and securest conservation depended: whereupon they for their parts indeavoured themselves to digest their griefs, according to Herods exhortation. Mean-while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himself, by reason of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which overturned and had almost slain her; yea so much did this casualty terrifie him (for fear lest the enemy in pursuit should surprize him during these delays) as that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himself, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them, and leave them subject to the enemies violence: assuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his own private interest, and neglect his friends perill. By these perswasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken unto him, as also for that he was overruled by the multitude of those who would not permit his hand to execute his will: so that taking up his mother, and doing her all the service that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and neereast means he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada, where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, and returned alwayes with victory from them. The Jews also were not in peace with him during this his flight; for scarcely had he travelled sixtie stounds out of the City, but that they assailed him in the high way: but he put them to flight and obtained the victorie, not like a desperate man enforced thereunto through necessitie, but like a discret, well furnished and valiant souldier. So that in the very place where he obtained that victory against the Jews (after such time as he was made King) he builded a most sumptuous palace: and neer unto the same a city which he called Herodium. Whilest he remained at Reffa (a borough of Idumæa) Joseph his brother came forth to meet him, and to consult with him as touching their whole estate, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed them, considering that they had no souldiers in pay, and the castle of Massada (whither he intended to flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause he sent away many to the number of nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselves here and there in the countrey of Idumæa; and for the better dispatch of their journey, he furnished them with victuals. As for himself, he took with him his most able souldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the castle of Massada, in which place he left the women and their train, to the number of eight hundred or thereabouts: and furnishing the place with corn, water, and other provisions necessary, he went unto Petra the chiefest city of Arabia. As soon as it was day, the Parthians sacked all that which appertained to the citizens of Jerusalem, and among other

A other things they spoiled the palace; notwithstanding they meddled not with Hircanus money, which amounted to some three hundred talents. They left divers other things behind them also that appertained to Herod, and especially that which had been transported into Idumæa by his mature providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the spoil of the Citie, but they foraged all the countrey round about, and razed Marissa a very rich city. Thus Antigonus, brought back into his countrey by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phasalus that were prisoners: yet was he vehemently displeased, because the women had escaped, whom according to his promise he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing lest Hircanus through the favour of the people should be re-established in his kingdom (who then was prisoner in the custody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Priesthood any more, by reason of that maim, because the law commandeth that they who are in that dignitie, should be found in all their members. But Phasalus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for understanding that he must needs die, he was no wayes dismayed with death, but that which he held most miserable & dishonourable was, that he must needs die by the hands of his enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not dispatch himself by other means, (because he was bound and chained) he knockt out his own brains against a stone, and so ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in such a desperate estate) depriving his enemies of that power which he intended to practise in tyrannizing over him at his pleasure. It is said that the wound being very deep, Antigonus sent privily Chirurgeons to cure him; and that under colour of healing him, they should put poyson into the same, where-through he might die. But before Phasalus gave up the ghost, he understood by a certain woman, that his brother Herod had escaped from his enemies: for which cause he endured his death with farre greater cheerfulness and constancy, seeing that he left behinde him such a man, as would revenge his death, and punish his enemies. But Herod was no wayes discomfited with the greatnesse of those adversities which environed him round about, but was the more whetted on to finde out new inventions, and to adventure dangerous attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom beforetime he had shewed much courtesie) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great necessitie, and to draw some money from him either by loan or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleased him.

D For being ignorant of his brothers death, he endeavoured himself to ransom him speedily from his enemies, by paying his rancome (which amounted to three hundred talents) and for that cause he led with him the sonne of Phasalus, who was onely seven yeers old, to leave him in pledge amongst the Arabians for the summe that was demanded. But certain messengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoined him that he should neither receive nor retain Herod. And this colourable pretence used he, because he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perswaded by the advice of the greatest in authoritie among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themselves masters of that treasure that Antipater had committed to their custody. Herod answered them, that he repaired not into their countrey to give them cause of any trouble, but onely to consult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own estate, and that afterwards he was resolved to depart, and withdraw himselfe into Egypt as secretly as might be possible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of his followers, and the next day he came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tidings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himself of his ingratitude, and speedily sent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten farre onward on his way, and was already arrived in poast neere to Pelusium: where being denied his passage to Alexandria in those ships that were there, he addressed himself to the Magistrates of the place, who highly respected and honoured him, and sent him to the Citie where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithstanding could she not perswade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithstanding the winter and those grievous troubles that at the very same time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himselfe therefore to saile into Pamphilia, he was tossed with a most cruell storme, so that with great danger at last he arrived in Rhodes, having been inforced in the tempest to cast into the sea a good part of his substance. There met he with Sappinas and Ptolomey two of his indeared friends. He found also that the City of Rhodes had suffered much misery by Cassius wars: and although his means were very scant, yet profited he them in what he might, and caused their wals to be repaired, notwithstanding that by so doing, he greatly hindered himself. After that, he caused a little frigot to be built, and embarked himself with

With him joyned Marion (whom Cassius had made Governour in Tyre.) For this man having occupied Syria by tyranny, kept garrison therein: Marion also invaded Galilee, which confined his countrey; and having seized three strong fortresses therein, he kept garrisons in the same. Herod also marching forth against him, dispossessed him of them all; and graciously dismissed those Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, bestowing benefits on some of them, for the love he bare unto their Citie. And that done, he came and encountred with Antigonus, and fought with him, and overcame him before he had scarcely entred on the marches of Judea, and drave him from thence. When he was come to Jerusalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crowns: for already was he inserted into Hircanus family, for that by promise he was his sonne in law, by which means, he had more willingly undertaken his defence, for that he was to marry Alexanders the sonne of Aristobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whom he begat three sonnes and two daughters. Before her also had he married a wife of his own nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest sonne.

ANTONIUS and Cesar having overcome Cassius neer unto the city of Philippi, Cesar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asia. And being in Bithynia, Embassadours resorted unto him from all parts: Thither also repaired certain principall men among the Jews to accuse Phasalus and Herod, saying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdome. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came unto him to answer those accusations that they had imposed on him: for which cause they that were his opposites, could obtain no audience: for Herod had bought that priviledge from them with his money. As soon as Antonius was arrived in Ephesus, Hircanus the high Priest and all our nation presently sent an Embassadour unto him, with a crown of gold, requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Cassius had taken prisoners (contrary to the law of arms) might be set at liberty, and that their countrey (which was taken from them in Cassius time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demands which the Jews had proposed, were reasonable, wrote back presently to the high Priest Hircanus and the Jews, and sent an Edict also to the Tyrians to this effect:

verſation and pietie. For at ſuch time as our adverſaries and enemies of the Romane nation ſpoiled all the countrey of Aſia, and without regard of their oaths ſpared neither Cities nor Temples, we have oppoſed our ſelves againſt them, not onely for our private reſpect, but in the quarrell of the common-weal, to the intent to puniſh the authors of ſuch offences committed againſt men, and of ſuch impieties perpetrated againſt God: for which we ſuppoſe that the Summe hath in a manner obſcured himſelf, by beholding with unwilling eyes what an hainous offence was committed againſt Cæſar. But we have gotten the upper hand of their impious enterprizes, which are fallen upon Macedonia, as on the countrey and aire, from whence proceed ſuch deteſtable and ungracious deſignes: and we have likewiſe cut off the courſe of their deſperate reſolution, which made them encounter us neer to Philippi a city of Macedonia, where we ſeized their places fortified by nature, and enclōſed with mountains as if it were with walls, as farre as the ſea, in ſuch manner as the paſſage was barred up, as it were with a gate, had not the gods given us way by reſiſting their unjuſt exploits, and furthering ours. Brutus is likewiſe compelled to flie to Philippi, where being incloſed by us, he ſuffered the like ruin with his conſort Cæſius; and ſince they have been puniſhed as they deſerved, me ſeemeth that we are ſeized of peace, and that Aſia hath had reſpoſe from warre, and all the body thereof is relieved from a grievous maladie, by the means of our victory. For which cauſe remembring us of you and your Nation, to the end to increaſe your good fortunes, we will bethink us of that which ſhall be commodious for you: and we have already ſent letters from city to city, to the intent that if any one among you, either captive or free-man, have been ſold to the utmoſt by Cæſius, or any of that army, they may be ſet at liberty. And our will is, that you make uſe of the bounty which we beſtow upon you, both in our ſelf as in Dolabella right, forbidding the Tyrians to moleſt you, and commanding them to reſtore all that which they have taken from the Jews in goods or poſſeſſions. As for the crown which you ſent me, I accept the ſame.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Governours, Senate and people of Tyre, Health: I have been informed in Ephesus by Hircanus Embaſſadours (who is high Prielt and Prince of the Jews) that you have ſeized their countrey, and ſpoiled the ſame, at ſuch time as our adverſaries held that Province. But in as much as we have undertaken the warre for the Empire, and that in defence of right and pietie, we have puniſhed theſe ingratefull, diſloyall and perfidious perſons; our will is, that you ſuffer our allies to live in peace: and as touching that which you have obtained by our adverſaries, our pleaſure is, that you reſtore the ſame to thoſe that are diſpoſſeſſed. For no one of them hath obtained either Province or Armie by the conſent of the Senate; but have raviſhed them by force, and afterwards beſtowed them on thoſe who have been miniſters of their impieties and injuſtice. But ſince they have been puniſhed according to their deſerts, we require that our allies may enjoy their own, without any impeachment: and if you hold any places at this preſent, which belong to Hircanus Prince of the Jews (that were ſeized ſince the time that Cæſius by unjuſt warre invaded our Provinces) reſtore them unto him, without offer of any violence, to hinder him from the poſſeſſion of his own. And if you have, or pretend to have any right in them, at ſuch time as I ſhall repair to thoſe places, it ſhall be lawfull for you to debate your right, and we will ſo judge, as that our allies ſhall receive no wrong.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Governours, Senate, and people of Tyre, Health: I have ſent you my edict, which my pleaſure is that you carefully look unto, and that you register it amongſt your publike records in Roman and Greek letters, and ſet it up in writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all men.

Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumvir, in the preſence of the Tyrians aſſembled for their publike affairs, hath declared, that Cæſius during the troubles, by the aſſiſtance of his ſouldiers, hath raviſhed another mans Province; and hath in like ſort ſpoiled our allies, and hath raviſhed the nation of the Jews, who are friends to the people of Rome: and for that by our valour we have reſpreſſed his insolence, by our edicts and judgements we will correct his offences; to the end that all things may be reſtored to our allies, and that all what ſoever hath been ſold, and appertained to the Jews (whether they be priſoners or poſſeſſions) be reſtored to their maſters, to the end that each man be at liberty as he was before, and that each mans poſſeſſion may be reſtored to his firſt owner. And my pleaſure is, that whoſoever diſobeyeth this ordinance, he may be puniſhed. And he that ſhall be convicted to have diſobeyed the ſame, he ſhall be puniſhed according to his demerit. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Arabians; all which we will inſert in convenient place, to reſſiſe what account the Romans made of our nation.

Hedib & Rufinus, chap. 12. Antigonus promiseth the Parthians a great summe of money to install him in the kingdome. Pacorus sendeth horsemen to Antigonus in Judaea. The Jews inhabiting about mount Carmel, joyn themselves with Antigonus.

AFTER this, Antonius retired himself into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him neer unto Cilicia, and entangled him in her love. At that time also, 100. of the chiefest reckning among the Jews, came once again in Embassage to him to accuse Herod, and his adherents: who to this end had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise undertook the defence of the young men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied unto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the Citie of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties governed the common weal best? who returned him answer, that they, who were on Herods side, were most studious of the weal publike. Antonius (who long since had born good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitalitie that he had received with their father, during the time that Gabinus was in Judaea) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affairs in Judaea: And to this effect wrote he his letters, and committed fourteen of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herod besought for their lives, he had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soon as they returned from their Embassage, they could not contain themselves in quiet, but resorted once more unto Antonius to the number of ten thousand, to the city of Tyre where Antonius sojourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadors of the Jews should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innovation, where contrariwise he confirmed Herods government. At that time Herod, who walked by the sea side, came unto them, advising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to give over their appeal, for fear lest some grievous misfortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gave no regard, certain Jews and inhabitants of that Citie, all at once ranne upon them, who slew some of them, and hurt other some, and the rest taking their flight towards their country, ever afterwards contained themselves and lived in quiet, through the fear they had conceived. But when the people ceased not to exclaim and protest against Herod, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that he commanded all those whom he held prisoners, should be slain.

The yeer after, Pacorus the Kings sonne, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, invaded and seized Syria. And about this time died Ptolomey the sonne of Mennaeus, and his sonne Lysias reigned in his stead, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus, who obtained this favour at his hands by the counsell and sollicitation of a certain Prince of great authority and credit with him.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Parthians make warre in Syria, to restore ANTIGONUS the sonne of ARISTOBULUS to his Kingdome.

AFTER this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to give them one thousand talents of silver, and five hundred women, if so be they would deprive Hircanus of the kingdome, and restore it unto him, and withall put Herod and his friends to death. Yet did he not deliver them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians led their army into Jewry to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the sea-coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Phoenicians received him into their Citie. He sent a troop of horsemen into Jewry to discover the estate of the countrey, and to give succours to Antigonus. The chieftain of these horsemen was the Kings butler, who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certain Jews (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) joyned themselves with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to invade his enemies, he conceived some hope that he might by their means reduce a certain part of the region under his government, which is called Dryme: and certain of his well-willers meeting him in the way, perswaded him to presse forward as farre as Jerusalem, where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they addresse themselves to assault the Kings palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was maintained in the market place, place, the young men repulsed the enemy, and drave him into the Temple. Which done, they sent certain armed men into the houses neer adjoining, to guard them: but the people rushing in upon them, and seeing they were destitute of aid, burned both them and the houses wherein they were. But this iniquity of theirs was presently revenged by Herod, who in a skirmish that he had with them, slew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily assaults between both parties, the enemies expected untill such time as the people (assembled from all parts of the countrey) should repair to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast of Pentecost. Which being come, many thousands of men assembled about the Temple, both armed and unarmed, who seized both the Temple and the City, except the Kings house onely, which Herod made good with a few men of warre. The wall thereof did Phasalus his brothers keep. But Herod with a company of his followers sallied out upon the enemy, who were planted in the suburbs, and fighting valiantly against them, he put divers thousands of them to flight, whereof some retired themselves into the Citie, other some into the Temple; the rest into a certain bulwark neer at hand. In this battell also Phasalus shewed no little valour.

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians, came into the Citie with some few horsemen at Antigonus request, making shew that he came to appease the sedition; but the effect and scope of his coming was, to obtaine the soveraigntie for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phasalus was come out to meet with him, and had courteously entertained him in his house, Pacorus perswaded him to goe Embassadour with him to Barsapharnes, laying a baite vnder this pretence to surprize him. He suspecting no treacheries, was easily perswaded; notwithstanding that Herod disliked the course, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to assaile Pacorus, and to assault and oppresse his forces, when they were come unto him. Nevertheless Hircanus and Phasalus undertook this Embassage, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod two hundred horsemen, and ten of those whom they call free-men) conducted the Embassadors. Now as soon as they came into Galilee, the governours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meet them: Barsapharnes also at the first gave them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with presents; but anon after, he began to practise treachery. For Phasalus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adjoynd the sea, where hearing tydings that Antigonus had promised one thousand talents, and five hundred virgins to the Parthians, he began already to suspect the Barbarians. For a certain friend of his had given him an inkling that there were treasons intended against him that very night, and that his lodging was privily beset with a guard. And surely they had been surpris'd, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Jerusalem) should be seized of Herod, fearing lest he having an inkling of their dyaster, should betake himself to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was set about them: For which cause there were certain of Phasalus friends, who counselled him, that without any more delay, he should betake him to his horse, and flee from thence: and amongst the rest, Ophius was most earnest, who had wrought out of Samanella a rich Syrian (who offered them his ships that rood hard by to further their flight) all that which they pretended. But Phasalus would neither forsake Hircanus, nor leave his brother Herod in danger, but repaying to Barsapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to use these sinister practices against them. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receive it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howsoever he wrought, it was an intolerable injurie to put Embassadors to death, who came unto him under pledge of his honour, and had no wayes offended him. But the Barbarian hearing these things, protested by an oath, that so one point of that which he had suspected, was true; but that he was onely troubled with false surmise: whereupon he presently departed to Pacorus.

CHAPTER XXV.

The Parthians lead away HIRCANUS, and PHASALUS into captivity.

AS soon as he was departed, certain of the Parthians took Hircanus and Phasalus prisoners, who mightily detested their perjuries. But the Eunuch that was sent unto Herod, had commandment given him to ennic and train him without the city walls, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certain messengers (who were sent by Phasalus to give him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemy in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addressed himself to Pacorus (and

(and those in greatest authority among the Parthians) as to them that were the masters: who subtilly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him that he should do well to repair with them without the wall to go and meet those messengers, who brought him letters; who had not as yet been seized by their adversaries, but came to certify him of Phasaelus good estate. But Herod gave them no credit, because he was already otherways advertised of his brothers surprisall, and had also farre greater suspicion of the Parthians by the sollicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom he had married. And although the rest made no account of her advertisements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that she was a most wise woman. Now whilest the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open assault upon such a man) they deferred the whole matter untill the next morning. Whilest thus they were debating of their difference, Herod came unto them, who rather giving credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) then to his adversaries, as soon as it was night, concluded to make use of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those uncertain dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those men of warre which he had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister and his betrothed, whom he was to marrie (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Aristobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her younger brother, with all their family and train, he departed into Idumæa without espiall or suspicion of the enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard or iron-hearted, who seeing such a pitifull spectacle, could not be moved to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their countrey with tears and complaints: and that which was worse, to leave their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redresse.

But Herod mastered these misfortunes by his invincible courage, and for that he was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themselves to immeasurable sorrow, for that by such means they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and securest conservation depended: whereupon they for their parts indeavoured themselves to digest their griefs, according to Herods exhortation. Mean-while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himself, by reason of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which overturned and had almost slain her; yea so much did this casualty terrifie him (for fear lest the enemy in pursuit should surprize him during these delaies) as that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himself, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them, and leave them subject to the enemies violence: assuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his own private interest, and neglect his friends perill. By these perswasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken unto him, as also for that he was overruled by the multitude of those who would not permit his hand to execute his will: so that taking up his mother, and doing her all the service that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and neereft means he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada, where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, and returned alwayes with victory from them. The Jews also were not in peace with him during this his flight, for scarcely had he travelled sixtie stounds out of the City, but that they assailed him in the high way: but he put them to flight and obtained the victorie, not like a desperate man enforced thereunto through necessitie, but like a discrete, well furnished and valiant souldier. So that in the very place where he obtained that victory against the Jews (after such time as he was made King) he builded a most sumptuous palace, and neer unto the same a city which he called Herodium. Whilest he remained at Resfa (a borough of Idumæa) Joseph his brother came forth to meet him, and to consult with him as touching their whole estate, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed them, considering that they had no souldiers in pay, and the castle of Massada (whither he intended to flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause he sent away many to the number of nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselves here and there in the countrey of Idumæa, and for the better dispatch of their journey, he furnished them with victuals. As for himself, he took with him his most able souldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the castle of Massada, in which place he left the women and their train, to the number of eight hundred or thereabouts: and furnishing the place with corn, water, and other provisions necessary, he went unto Petra the chiefest city of Arabia. As soon as it was day, the Parthians sacked all that which appertained to the citizens of Jerusalem; and among other

A other things they spoiled the palace; notwithstanding they medled not with Hircanus money, which amounted to some three hundred talents. They left divers other things behind them also that appertained to Herod, and especially that which had been transported into Idumæa by his mature providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the Spoil of the Citie, but they foraged all the countrey round about, and razed Marissa a very rich city. Thus Antigonus, brought back into his countrey by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phasalus that were prisoners: yet was he vehemently displeased, because the women had escaped, whom according to his promise he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing lest Hircanus through the favour of the people should be re-established in his kingdom (who then was prisoner in the custody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Priesthood any more, by reason of that maim, because the law commandeth that they who are in that dignitie, should be found in all their members. But Phasalus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for understanding that he must needs die, he was no wayes dismayed with death, but that which he held most miserable & dishonourable was, that he must needs die by the hands of his enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not dispatch himself by other means, (because he was bound and chained) he knockt out his own brains against a stone, and so ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in such a desperate estate) depriving his enemy of that power which he intended to practise in tyrannizing over him at his pleasure. It is said that the wound being very deep, Antigonus sent privily Chirurgeons to cure him; and that under colour of healing him, they should put poyson into the same, where-through he might die. But before Phasalus gave up the ghost, he understood by a certain woman, that his brother Herod had escaped from his enemies: for which cause he endured his death with farre greater cheerfulness and constancy, seeing that he left behinde him such a man, as would revenge his death, and punish his enemies. But Herod was no wayes discomfited with the greatness of those adversities which environed him round about, but was the more whetted on to finde out new inventions, and to adventure dangerous attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom beforetime he had shewed much courtesie) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great necessitie, and to draw some money from him either by loan or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleased him. For being ignorant of his brothers death, he endeavoured himself to ransom him speedily from his enemies, by paying his ranfome (which amounted to three hundred talents) and for that cause he led with him the sonne of Phasalus, who was onely seven yeers old, to leave him in pledge amongst the Arabians for the summe that was demanded. But certain messengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoined him that he should neither receive nor retain Herod. And this colourable pretence used he, because he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perswaded by the advice of the greatest in authoritie among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themselves masters of that treasure that Antipater had committed to their custody. Herod answered them, that he repaired not into their countrey to give them cause of any trouble, but onely to consult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own estate, and that afterwards he was resolved to depart, and withdraw himselfe into Egypt as secretly as might be possible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of his followers, and the next day he came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tidings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himself of his ingratitude, and speedily sent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten farre onward on his way, and was already arrived in poast neere to Pelusium: where being denied his passage to Alexandria in those ships that were there, he addressed himself to the Magistrates of the place, who highly respected and honoured him, and sent him to the Citie where Cleopatra was, who entertained him kindly: yet notwithstanding could she not perswade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithstanding the winter and those grievous troubles that at the very same time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himselfe therefore to saile into Pamphilia, he was tossed with a most cruell storme; so that with great danger at last he arrived in Rhodes, having been inforced in the tempest to cast into the sea a good part of his substance. There met he with Sappinus and Ptolomey two of his indeared friends. He found also that the City of Rhodes had suffered much misery by Cassius wars: and although his means were very scant, yet profited he them in what he might, and caused their wals to be repaired, notwithstanding that by so doing, he greatly hindered himself. After that, he caused a little frigot to be built, and embarked himself with his friends to repair into Italy, and arrived at Brundisium, and from thence went to Rome. Antonius loved Herod, & hated Antigonus.

Cæsar Augustus Herods friend.

ANTONIUS hearing all those alterations that had befallen Herod, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himself of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subject to no lesse casualties) and the rather was he induced to do him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, as also by reason of Herods promises of certain summes of money, if so be he were made king by his means, as he had been beforetime declared Tetrarch. But that which most moved him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare to Antigonus, whom he accounted to be a malicious man, and an enemy to the Romans fortune. On the other side, Cæsar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those armies which Antipater had brought into Egypt in his fathers service, as also because of the good hospitality and kindnesse that he had shewed him in all things; as in especiall to gratifie Antonius, who was well affected towards Herod. Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought forth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the benefits which the Romans had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antigonus for the Romans enemy, not onely for his ancient crimes, but also for that in contempt of the Romans he had received the kingdome from the Parthians. Whilest the Senate was sore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian warre, it were not amisse that Herod should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principall demonstration of the love and affection which Antonius bare unto Herod, was, that he not onely obtained him the kingdome, beyond all hope: for never thought he that the Romans would grant that dignity unto him, who were wont to reserve that honour to those of the Kings blood; and therefore he intended to have demanded it for his wives brother Alexander, and nephew to Aristobulus by the fathers side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander Herod afterward put to death, as it shall be declared in place convenient) but also for that within the term of seven dayes, he sent him out of Italy with the unexpected titles of his felicitie.

Herod admitted into the Senate, and declared king.

Herod intending the kingdome for his wives brother, enjoyeth the same himself. Herod ascendeth the Capitoll with Antonius and Cæsar.

Herods family besieged by Antigonus in Massada.

Ventidius under pretext to help Joseph, flieth to get money of Antigonus.

As soon as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Cæsar issued forth, leading Herod between them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other magistrates, went up into the capitoll to do sacrifice, and to place there this decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herods reign Antonius feasted him; and after this sort was he established King in the hundred eighty and fourth Olympiade, in the yeer wherein C. Domitius Calvus twice Consul, and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Mean while Antigonus besieged those that were in the castle of Massada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessarie (except it were water) for which cause Joseph Herods brother that was within, and two hundred of his friends, had concluded to flie unto the Arabians: for that they understood that Malchus had repented himself of the fault he had committed against Herod. But whilest they stood upon these tearms, God powred down a huge rain on a certain night, that in short time filled their cisterns in such sort, as that they had no more necessitie to flie; and from that time forward they waxed confident: and for that this abundance of water befell them by Gods providence, they made a sally upon their enemies, in which they charged Antigonus souldiers after such a manner, sometime in open field, sometime by covert assault, that they slew a great number of them. At that time Ventidius a Romane Captain was sent into Syria to drive the Parthians from thence, and after their departure he arrived in Jewry, making shew that he would assist Joseph: but in effect all his pretence was to draw money from Antigonus.

Antigonus. Being therefore encamped neer unto Jerusalem, and having drawn sufficient money from Antigonus, he retired himself with the greater part of his forces: and to the intent his deceitfull dealing might not be discovered, he left Silo with a company of his souldiers: who likewise was honoured by Antigonus, for fear lest he should be cause of some new trouble, before such time as the Parthians, whose coming he expected, should yeeld him aid.

CHAP. XXVII.

HEROD returneth from Rome by sea, and fighteth against ANTIGONUS.

AFTER that Herod was come from Italy by sea to Ptolemais, and that he had assembled no small number of souldiers both strangers and his own countymen, he marched forward against Antigonus, and passed thorough Galilee. Silo and Venidius also gave him assistance in this action, having received direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they should assist Herod to recover his countrey. But Venidius was employed in appeasing the troubles that were raised in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo he kept in Judaea, having been corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the countrey, the more and more increased his forces, and all Galilee (except a very few) submitted themselves unto him. Whilest therefore he marched forward toward Massada, (being urged thereunto in that he was to relieve his parents that were besieged therein) the citie of Joppe would not grant him passage: for the Citizens thereof were his enemies: so that it behoved him first of all to ruinate the same, to the end he might leave no retreat or place of rescous for his enemy on his back; if so be he made toward Jerusalem. Upon which occasion Silo laying hold, dislodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Jews did pursue, Herod sallied out with a small company, and put them to flight, and saved Silo, notwithstanding he fought very coldly and cowardly. Afterwards being seized of Joppe, he hastened onwards to deliver his friends that were besieged in Massada; but part of the inhabitants submitted themselves unto him for the friendship they had born unto his father: another sort of them, for the honour that they bare unto him: the rest admitted his government, in acknowledgement of those benefits they had received from them both. But the greatest part was thereunto moved by the hope they had conceived of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his government. Thus by these means was his army mightily increased.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 22. al. 16. Herod returning back out of Italy, leadeth forth his army against Antigonus. Herod assaulteth Joppe, and taketh it.

Many submit themselves to Herod.

Whilest thus he marched forward, Antigonus seized those places that were fittest to lay ambushes in, or to fight at advantages by the way (notwithstanding that by those means and stratagems he did but small or no hurt at all to his enemy;) so that Herod raised the siege, and discharged his friends out of the castle of Massada: and after he had taken the fort of Reffa, he approached Jerusalem, being attended by Siloes army, and by divers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when as he had pitched his camp to the westward of the Citie, those that kept the watch and guard on that side, shot their arrows and cast stones against him: divers likewise trouped forth, and fought, hand to hand, against those that were planted there: For which cause first of all Herod caused proclamation to be made round about the wals, signifying unto them that he resorted thither for the common profit of the people, and for the conservation of the city, without intent of revenge or memory of any wrongs that his private enemies had offered him, promising his most free pardon to all those whosoever had hainously offended him. Hereunto Antigonus made this answer (turning his speech to Silo and the Romane souldiers) that contrary to all justice they gave the kingdome to Herod, who was a private man, and an Idumæan (that is to say, a half Jew) whereas it hath been a custome to bestow the same on them that are of the line of the Priests. For albeit at that present they were displeased with him, for that he was seized of the kingdome by the means of the Parthians, and had resolved with themselves to dispossesse him; yet that there were divers others of that royall race, who might be made Kings according to the law, who have no wayes misdeameaned themselves towards the Romanes, and moreover there are Priests, who should not be justly and uprightly dealt withall, if they should be deprived of that honour which appertaineth unto them. Whilest they debated the matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and injurious taunts the one against the other, Antigonus commanded his men to assail those that were neer unto the wall: who shooting many arrows with great courage against them, drave them easily from the Tower they kept.

Reffa taken, & Massada delivered from the siege, after which Herod marcheth towards Jerusalem. Herod proclaimeth about the wals of Jerusalem, that he repaired thither for the good of the people, & the common weal. Antigonus upbraideth Herod that he is but half a Jew, and of no kingly race. The enemy repulseth Herods power from the wall.

before Christ's Nativity, 37.

Silon suborneth some of his souldiers, to take an occasion to depart from Jerusalem. Herod procured & furnished the army with victuals and abundant munition. Antigonus sendeth out souldiers to surprize Herod's victualers.

The Romans send to their garrisons to winter.

Robbers.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in Galilee, and overcometh them, and bringeth all Galilee under his subjection.

Antigonus resorteth to victuall the Roman army.

Ventidius sendeth for Silon to warre against the Parthians.

At that time Silon gave manifest proof that he had been corrupted by money: for he suborned divers of his souldiers, who cried out that they had want of victuals, and demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requested that they might be placed in some convenient garrisons to winter in, for that the places round about the Citie were desolate; because all necessaries for maintenance of life had been taken away and wasted by Antigonus souldiers. Thus was the whole army troubled; so that each of them prepared themselves to dislodge. But Herod importuned and cried out upon the Captains and souldiers that were under Silon's charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him, whom Cesar, Antony and the Senate of Rome had sent thither: That for his own part he would give order that they should have abundance and foison of whatsoever they demanded, and incontinently departing from them (after he had presented them with this request) he deprived Silon of all colour and pretext of flight: for he caused an incredible quantitie of victuals to be brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them corn, wine, oyl, cattell, and all other such provision from Jericho, to the end that from that time forward the souldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof, so that he incontinently sent men thorowout the countrey, who might intercept and surprize the purveyours and victuallers. Who following Antigonus commandment, assembled a great number of souldiers neer unto Jericho, and encamping in the mountains, espied and watched those that brought the victuals. Mean-while Herod lay not still, but took with him ten companies, five of Romane souldiers, and five of Jews, with whom he intermixed some forrain souldiers, with some few horsemen, and came to Jericho; where being arrived, he seized the Town, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom five hundred with their wives and children were retired into the tops of the mountains, whom he took, and afterwards set at libertie: but the Romane souldiers, entring into their houses, and finding them full of all sorts of moveables, they spoiled the same. And the King having left a garrison in Jericho, returned to his own place, dismissing the Romane armie to go and winter in the countries lately surrendred unto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also purchased this favour at Silon's hands by store of bribes, that part of his armie was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to come favour with Antony.

Whilest thus the Romans lived in all abundance and bare no arms, Herod would not be still, but sent his brother Ioseph into Idumæa, with one thousand footmen, and four hundred horse; and himself resorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who beforetime were departed out of Massada. After this he went into Galilee to surprize certain castles which were held by Antigonus garrisons, and being arrived at Sephonis (during a great snow) after that Antigonus garrisons were departed out of the foresaid castles, he found a great abundance of all sorts of necessarie munition. And there having notice of certain theeves, who inhabited in caves, he sent a troop of horsemen, with three companies of footmen, against them: whom he commanded to do justice on those robbers (now the place where they kept, was not farre from a borough called Arbela:) and fourty dayes after, he himself with all his armie resorted thither. Now whereas the enemies issued out against him with a hardy resolution, the left wing of his Squadron retired and fainted; but he coming on with his main battell, put them to flight, who were already almost masters of the field, and made those of his followers that fled, to turn their faces, and to pursue their enemies as farre as the flood Jordan: who fled some of them by one way, some by another, so that he drew all Galilee under his subjection, except those that inhabited and held the caves. He distributed money also amongst his souldiers, and gave each souldier an hundred and fiftie drachmes, and farre more unto their chieftains, and afterwards sent them to winter in garrisons neer at hand.

About this time Silon and his Captains, who had passed the winter in the said garrisons, came unto him (for that Antigonus would no more furnish them with victuals:) for he gave them maintenance for no more time then a moneth, commanding those that dwelt round about them, to spoil the countrey, and afterwards to retire themselves into the mountains, to the end that the Romans might be destitute of necessarie maintenance, and by that means might be consumed with famine. Herod gave Pheroras his yongest brother the charge of that provision, commanding him to inclose the fort of Alexandrion with a wall, who speedily brought to passe that the souldiers had all sorts of necessaries at commandment: he reedified also the fort of Alexandrion which had been laid desolate. About that time Antony sojourned in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who having sent for Silon to accompane him against the Parthians, did first of all charge him to assist Herod in that warre: and afterwards

afterwards to excite the provincially confederates to further his warre. But Herod dismissing Silon and his company to follow their destinated warres with Ventidius, did in his own person lead out his souldiers against those thieves that lived in dens. Now these caves were situate in the most highest and inaccessible mountains, impregnable through narrow paths, environed with sharp rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited secretly, with all their families, King Herod caused a certain number of coffers to be made, fastned to yron chains, which he caused to be let down by an engine from the top of the mountain (because it was neither possible by reason of the steepnesse of the hill to ascend the same from beneath, neither from above to creep downward against them.) These chests were filled with souldiers, armed with great hooks to draw these thieves unto them, and to break their necks headlong from the height to the bottome. But the use of these coffers was dangerous, for it was necessary to let them down an infinite depth into the caves, especially for that the thieves had necessarie munition among them: notwithstanding when they had gotten down, none of the thieves durst peep out of the mouthes of their caves, but fear constrained them to hold themselves quiet. But a certain souldier, having girt his sword by his side, and taken hold of the chain with both his hands whereto the coffer was fastned, slid down as farre as the entry of the cave: and being displeased that no one issued out, he shot divers arrows at those that were within, and wounded them; and after that, with his hook he drew those unto him who resisted him, and tumbling them down head-long from the steepie rock: which done, he rushed in upon those that were within the cave, and slew many of them, and afterwards returned and rested himself in his coffer. Divers hearing the groans of those that were wounded, were surprized with fear and despair of their life: but the nights approach was the cause that the matter was not fully atchieved, and many of them (receiving notice of the Kings free pardon by a Herald) submitted themselves. The next day they renewed and continued the same maner of fight, and divers issued out of their coffers to fight upon the outward entrances of the caves, into which they cast fire, which (for that there was great quantitie of wood in the caves) did quickly burn. Within these caves there was a certain old man apprehended, with his wife and seven sonnes: who being required by them that he would suffer them to go and submit themselves to their enemies, took up the entry of the cave, and as his sonnes advanced themselves to issue out, he slew them, untill such time as he had massacred them all, and after them his wife; and finally, when he had cast their dead bodies down the rocks, he threw himself down headlong after them, preferring death before servitude. Yet before his death, he reviled Herod in bitter words, and upbraided him of his obscuritie and ignoble race: and although Herod (who saw all that which had happened) stretched out his hand unto him and promised him pardon; yet would he not respect him; and by this means were all these caves entred, and the thieves therein taken.

Now when the King had established Ptolomey Captain over the souldiers in that region, he retired himself into Samaria, with six hundreth horsemen, and three thousand footmen, with a resolution to fight with Antigonus, and to end their quarrell. But Ptolomey had but very slender successe in his government: for they that before-time had troubled the countrey of Galilee, sallied out upon him, and overthrew him. After which execution they fled into the Marishes and inaccessible places, where they robbed and spoiled all the countrey. But Herod returning and setting upon them, punished them: for he slew some of them, and the rest were constrained to flie into strong places, where he besieging them and entring their fortresses perforce, slew the men, and destroyed their fortifications: and having brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the summe of one hundred talents. Mean while, Pacorus was slain in warre, and the Parthians were discomfited with him, which was the cause that Ventidius sent Macharas to succour Herod with two legions and 1000. horse, and that by the commandment of Antonius. But Macharas was drawn by Antigonus, who corrupted him with money: and notwithstanding Herods contradiction and dissuasion; yet resorted he unto him, alleading that he did it to look into his actions. But Antigonus suspecting his sudden approach, entertained him not, but caused him to be darted at and driven thence; giving him to understand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, and how he was affected towards him: who at that time perceived plainly that Herod had given him good counsell, and that himself had misdome in misbelieving his advice: for which cause he returned to the citie Emaus, and slew all those Jews whom he met withall in the way, whether friends or enemies: so highly displeased was he at that which had happened. Herod fore moved hereat, came to Samaria, resolving with himself to poste unto Antonius to complain of these aggrievances; considering that he had no need of such associates, who did him more harm then his enemies; whereas of himself he was able to make good his war against Antigonus. But Macharus hastened after him, requiring him to stay, and to travell no further on that journey, or if he might not be delivered, he prayed him to leave his brother Ioseph behind him, who might with them make warre against Antigonus. By these perswasions and instant intreaties of Macharus, he was somewhat appeased: so that he left his brother Ioseph behinde him, with an army, charging him no way to hazard his fortune, or to fall at oddes with Macharus. As for himself he hastened toward Antony, who at that time besieged Samosata (a Citie situate neer unto Euphrates) having with him an army of his associates, both horsemen and footmen. When Herod was arrived in Antioch, he found divers men assembled there, who were desirous to go and seek out Antony: but they durst not set forward on the way, for fear lest certain Barbarians should set upon them, and kill them in their journey: these did Herod assure, and offered himself to be their guide upon the way. Now when they came to their second bait, some two daies journey off Samosata, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred up the way with hurdles, and had likewise hidden certain horsemen thereabouts, who should lie in covert untill such time as the passengers had recovered the Plain. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush consisting of about some five hundred horsemen, suddenly charged Herod who was in his reeward, when as therefore they had broken the former ranks whom they had met, Herod with his troupe that was about him, incontinently repulsed them; and after he had encouraged his followers and whetted them on to the fight, he wrought so much, that he made those that fled to turn their faces, and to fight; so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The King also pursued them so long, untill at last he recovered that which had been taken by them, which was a certain number of sumpter-horses and slaves. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number then those who encountered him at first, he likewise (rallying his forces together) charged and overcame them; and killing divers of them, he secured the way to those that followed after, who all of them acknowledged him for their preserver and guide.

Herod was honourably entertained by Antonius and his host.

The year of the world, 3928. before Christs Nativity, 36.

Sosius hath the army committed to his charge by Antonius, who departeth into Egypt. Ioseph Herods brother is slain by Antigonus. The Galileans revolt from Herod. Macharus fortifieth Geth.

Herod departeth from Daphne a suburb of Antioch, into Galilee.

Herod fighteth with the Galileans, and overcometh them, and driveth them into a castle.

When he drew neer unto Samosata, Antony sent out his army in goodly array to meet and honour him, and withall to succour him, in that he had heard that the Barbarians had assailed him. As soon as he came to *Antony*s presence, he entertained him kindly; and after he had heard that which had befallen him in the way, he embraced him in admiration of his vertue, and did him great honour, as to him whom a little before he had raised to a royall dignitie. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendered the fort of Samosata to Antony, and upon this occasion the war was ended. Whereupon Antony committed the province with the army to Sosius: and after he had commanded him to succour Herod, he departed into Egypt. Sosius therefore sent two legions of souldiers before into Judæa to succour Herod, and afterwards he followed with the rest of his army.

In the mean while Ioseph died in Jewry on this occasion that ensueth: For forgetting his brother Herods commandement, which he gave him at such time as he repaired to Antony, he took to him five companies of souldiers which Macharus had left him; and marching towards Jericho to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his tents upon the mountains. And for that the Roman troups were but newly levied, and consisted of those men who were untrained in the warres, and for the most part were gathered out of the countrey of Cœlo-syria: the enemies having advertisement hereof, assailed and surprised him in certain places of disadvantage, where there was a hot skirmish between them, in which Ioseph died fighting valiantly; and all his army was discomfited: for six companies of them were slain. After that the dead bodies were at Antigonus command, he cut off *Ioseph*s head, which Pheroras his brother ransomed for the price of fiftie talents. Which done, the Galileans revolting from their Governours, drowned Herods partakers in the lake; so that divers commotions and troubles were raised in Jewry. Macharus he fortified the castle of Geth. This misfortune of Ioseph was reported to the King, in a certain suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who before the tidings, had alreadie conceived some suspition and fear, grounded upon certain dreams, which gave him certain intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition, he arrived neer to the mount Libanus, where he took about eight hundred men with him, and the Roman legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his army by night, and crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the enemies came forth against him, and were overcome by him, and shut up in a fort, from whence they were departed but the day before; where Herod assailed them by break of day: But being unable to offer them any prejudice, by reason of the disposition of the weather, he led his men into the villages neer adjoining. But when Antony

A second legion was come, and annexed to his forces; they that were within the fort were dismayed, and forsook the same by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Jericho; with an intent to revenge his brothers death; and being encamped neer unto the same, he banquetted and entertained the Chieftains of his army; and after the feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, he withdrew himself into his lodging. In which place it appeared, how much God loved the King: for the roof of the house where he had solemnized his feast, fell down without hurt to any one whomsoever: for no man was left within it. Whence it came to passe, that each one perswaded himself that Herod was beloved by God; considering he had avoided so great and unexpected a perill.

The year of the world, 3928. before Christs nativity, 36.

The house wherein Herod solemnized his feast, fell down when the guests were gone, without any mans detriment.

Herod wounded by his enemies. Antigonus sendeth Pappus to Samaria

The next day, six thousand of his enemies came down from the top of the mountains to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans, and their forlorn hope chased Herods souldiers with darts, and stones, who was himself also hurt in the thigh with an arrow. Antigonus sent a Captain to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some souldiers, intending thereby to signify unto his enemies, that he had more men of warre then he needed. Pappus drew neer to Macheras the Roman Captain: and as touching Herod, he took five cities by force, and put some two thousand of them that were in garrison to the sword; and afterwards (having set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus; who was encamped in a borough called Isanas. Divers that came from Jericho and Jewry, submitted themselves to Herod, who drawing neer the enemy (who marched forward with great hardinesse) fought with him and overcame him, and being inflamed with a great desire he had to revenge his brothers death, he pursued them that fled, and slew them even within their borough. These houses were incessantly filled with men of war, and divers fled and hid themselves upon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the roofes of the houses were beaten down, and he saw that all were filled with souldiers, whereby divers were slain by stones that were darted at them from above, and afterwards cast and killed them by heaps: which was the most grievous spectacle of all those that had hapned in those wars, to see an infinite number of bodies hidden one under another amidst the roomes of the houses.

Fight in the houses.

This exploit of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemy, who hereafter expected far more worse fortunes at his hands: For a man might have seen them flie away in heaps: and had not a sudden and forcible tempest false upon them, the triumphant army of Herod had incontinently entred Jerusalem with assurance of victory, which had made a final end of all that war. For, Antigonus each day bethought him how to flie away, & to forsake the city. But for that it was already grown dark, Herod commanded his souldiers to refresh themselves, and for that he himself was weary, he entred into his lodging to bathe himself: in which place he overwent a mighty misfortune, from which he escaped by Gods providence. For (whereas he was naked and accompanied with one onely servant to attend him) at such time as he bathed, there were a certain number of armed enemies hidde in that lodging, who were fled thither for the fear they had: and during the time that Herod bathed, the first amongst them issued with his naked sword & got the door, and after him the second, and the third no lesse armed, without offending the King, for the fear that they had of his presence: and content to escape in their own persons, without the prejudice of other men. The next day he sent Pappus head to his brother Pheroras, who was slain by his own sword in revenge of the injurie offered to Ioseph. When the tempest was done, he departed from thence, and approached neer to Jerusalem, and encamped neer unto the citie. This was about the third yeer since he was created King at Rome: and encamping himself in the place which was (as he thought) fittest for battery, he addressed himself towards the Temple side, resolving to batter and make breach in that place in like maner as Pompey had done before him. Having therefore erected three bulwarks in three places, he builded towers thereon by the assistance of many workmen, and by means of a great quantitie of wood, which he caused to be cut down round about the place, and having pointed such men as were of ripe Judgement to oversee these works, he left his army well provided, and resorted to Samaria, to marry with the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobolus sonne to whom he was betrothed, according as I have heretofore declared.

selves together neer unto the wals of Jerusalem, and planted their siege nigh unto the wall of the citie that extendeth towards the Northward. The army contained eleven legions of footmen, with six thousand horsemen: besides the succours that came from Syria. Of this army there were two Generals, namely Sofius, who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod:
and Herod himself, who made war for himself, with an intent that having dispossessed Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed enemy to Rome) he himself might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree. Those Jews that were within the enclosure of the wals (that is to say, almost all the nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage and affection, vaunting and boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good hap and successe to the people, namely, that God would deliver them from all dangers: and spoiling all provision without the citie, that was either behovefull for the use of man and beast, by their secreet thefts and excursions also they made the very besiegers destitute of relief and victuals. Which inconvenience Herod so well prevented, that he forestalled their means of theft, and laid ambushes in place convenient to cut them off. As for victuals, he sent his footmen to fetch his provision from farre, so that within a very little space they had abundance of all that which was necessary in the campe. He erected also with no lesse carefulnesse three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of workmen: for it was Summer time, and neither was the aire incommodious, or negligence of the workmen such, but that they presently furnished and finished them. Afterwards having raised their engines upon them, they battered the wall, with as much violence and diligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no waies amate those that were within; who for their parts used all the cunning that might be possible to defend themselves, and by divers sallies set fire upon the enemies engines; and burnt not onely those that were halfe made, but those that were wholly perfected: and when necessitie drave them to handy stroks, they shewed no lesse valour then the Romans courage; but they were inferiour unto them in skill and martiall discipline. And when as the first wall was beaten down, they builded up a new, and countermined against those mines that were made by the enemy, so that they fought under ground hand to hand. Thus using despaire rather then courage, they sustained the warre to the uttermost; yea notwithstanding they were besieged by a great army, and pressed by famine and want of victuals: for the year wherein the siege was continued, was the seventh, in which the earth was unmanured, which by us is called the year of rest. But finally twenty chosen souldiers first of all mounted upon the wall; and after them one of Sofius Centurions: for the first wall was taken in the fourtieth day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burned, which were neer unto the Temple: which (as Herod said) were burned by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Jews. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the Citie were taken, the Jews fled into the Temple, and into the higher town, for fear they had, lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices unto God: and they sent Embassadors to their enemies, to require that it might be lawfull for them onely to bring in certain beasts to offer them for sacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this means that they would submit themselves & yeeld up the places. But perceiving that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the soveraigntie in Antigonus, he gave the assault, and took the citie by force: where all things were incontinently filled with murthers, in that the Romans were displeased, because they had so long time continued the siege; and the Jews that were on Herods side, enforced themselves utterly to exterminate all those that were of the contrary party: so that continuall slaughters ranged and reigned every where, both in porches, and in the houses whereinto they entred: Neither did the religious reverence of the Temple save those suppliants that resorted thither for safety, but that without all compassion both old and young were slaughtered: Neither did their murdering hand spare or refrain from women, nay not so much as from young infants. And although the

- A the King besought and requested them to forbear them, yet no man gave over, but all sorts of persons were murdered by them, without respect either of sex or age. Antigonus inconsiderate of that estate wherein he had been, or the fortune and disaster that at that present attended him, came down from the tower and humbled himself on his knees before Sofius feet; who having no compassion of the change of that estate wherein he saw him, outrageously scorned him, calling him Madam Antigona: yet left he him not without guard after the manner of a Woman, but fast bound for his further assurance. But Herod was busied in devising how he might moderate his associates and strangers, after he had the upper hand over his enemies: For the strangers swarmed into the Citie by heapes, and not onely into the Temple, but also into the Sanctuary. He therefore exhorted some, and threatned other some, and restrained the rest by force of arms; and he was more troubled at that present in being a Conquerour, then if he had been conquered: for that those things that were not lawfull to be seen, were beheld by prophane men. He prevented likewise the spoile of the Citie, as much as in him lay: Beseeching Sofius most instantly, to preserve it to the utmost, asking him if the Romans would leave him King of a desert, after they had voided the Citie of men and goods? Alledging furthermore, that he esteemed the government of the whole world of no value, in regard of the life of one of his Citizens. Sofius answered, that it was reason that the pillage should be given to the souldier, who had borne the hazard of the siege: whereunto Herod answered, that he would satisfie every man out of his own treasury: and by this means, he ransomed the rest of the Citie by fulfilling those promises: For he gave many mightie gifts unto every one of the souldiers, and by proportion unto the Captains: but above all, he royally rewarded Sofius; so that every one of them departed very rich in silver.
- B
- C These calamities hapned in the Citie of Jerusalem, in the yeer wherein Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were Consuls, which was in the hundreth, fourescore and fift Olympiade, in the third moneth, on the daies wherein the solemn fast was celebrated; as if this affliction had jumpt together in one issue and instant with that of Pompeys: for on the same day had the same Citie been taken twenty and seven yeers before. Sofius offered a crown of gold unto God, & afterwards departed from Jerusalem, leading Antigonus prisoner with him unto Antony. But Herod fearing lest if Antigonus should be kept by Antony, and sent to Rome, he should debate his title with him before the Senare by protest that he was descended of the royall Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common person: and that although he had offended the Romans, and thereby might not deserve to be King; yet at least his children, who were of the Princely Line, were not to be denied their title: Herod, I say, fearing these things, wrought so much by force of his money with Antony, that he caused him to put Antigonus to death, so that at that time Herod was truly delivered frō all his fear. Thus ended the estate of the Asmoneans, after one hundred twenty and six yeers. This Family was famous both for their nobilitie, and also by reason of their Sacerdotall dignity, and for the noble actions and exploits, which their ancestors had atchieved for our nation; but they lost their authoritie through their mutuall factions: which sovereignty was deriued to Herod Antipaters sonne, who was ignoble by birth, and of mean friends, who were subjects and vassals to Kings. See here what we have received from our ancestors, as touching the end of the race of the Asmoneans.

CHAP. I.

Jerusalem being taken by SOSIUS and HEROD, ANTIGONUS is healed by ANTONIES command: HEROD maketh away all his chiefest friends.

The year of the world, 3930. Define Christs birth, 34.

Herod preferreth his favorites, and killeth his enemies. The Pharisees honoured by him. Pollio fore-prophecied Herods tyranny.

The slaughter of them that were of Antigonus faction.

IN the former book I have declared how Sosius and Herod took the Citie of Jerusalem by force, and with it Antigonus prisoner: now will we also declare that which hath subsequently followed: for after that Herod had obtained the absolute government over the whole land of Judæa, he advanced all those among the common people, who favoured his proceedings: as for those who were opposed against him, there passed not a day wherein some one or other of them suffered not punishment. But amongst the rest, Pollio the Pharisee, and Sameas his Disciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the siege of Jerusalem, they counselled the inhabitants to receive and entertain Herod: for which cause he respected them accordingly. This Pollio in times past (when Herod was found guilty of death) foretold Hircanus and the rest of the Judges in way of exprobration, that being absolved by them, he should one day inflict punishment on them all. Which prediction God in proceſſe of time approved by the event: no sooner therefore became he master of Jerusalem, but he gathered together all the rich household stuffe that was in the Palace; and furthermore having spoiled the rich men of their goods, and by this means levied a great summe of gold and silver, he sent great presents to Antony and his friends. Moreover, he condemned five and fourtie of Antigonus principall and noblest favourites to death, setting straight watch about their doors, that none of them might be carried out under colour of being dead. The dead bodies likewise were trodden under foot: and all the gold, silver, or jewels that was to be found amongst them, was carried to the King, and converted to his use, so that there was no end of these miseries. For the covetousnesse of the Conquerour (whose greedy and thirsty desire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on whatsoever was theirs. And for that it was the seventh year, it necessarily came to passe that the land was left left unmanured: for we are forbidden to sow in this year. Antony having taken Antigonus prisoner, resolved to keep him in prison untill the time of his triumph: But after he had received tidings that the nation of the Jews were ready to innovate and rebell, and continued their good affection toward Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceived against Herod, he concluded with himself to take his head from him at Antioch: for the Jews could scarcely contain themselves. Strabo of Cappadocia testifieth no lesse in these words: Antony having brought Antigonus the Jew to Antioch, caused his head to be cut off; and was the first among the Romans that hath caused a King to be beheaded in this maner: supposing that the Jews might never otherwise be induced to change their opinions, and receive Herod: yet this opinion of his was not answerable to equitie. For notwithstanding whatsoever imprisonment he might devise, yet could they not be induced to call him King: in so high estimate and account held they their former King. But Antony supposed that that infamie would obscure his renown, and lessen the generall hate that they bare to Herod. See here what Strabo writeth.

As soon as the high Priest Hircanus (who was prisoner among the Parthians) heard that Herod had taken possession of the Kingdome, he returned back unto him, being delivered after this maner following: Barzapharnes, and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians had taken Hircanus, who was first high Priest, and afterwards King, and with him Phasaelus Herod's brother, and led them away prisoners with them into their own countrey: Phasaelus not able to endure the dishonour of imprisonment, and preferring an honourable death before a reproachfull and ignominious life, murdered himself, as I have heretofore declared.

CHAP. II.

RHAAATES King of Parthia, understanding how nobly Hircanus was descended, who was brought prisoner unto him, entertained him graciously: and for this cause drew him out of prison, permitting him to converse in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Jews, who honoured Hircanus very much; and no lesse then their high Priest and King. The like also did all they of that nation inhabiting as farre as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that he was advertised that Herod was possessed of the kingdome; he transferred his hopes another way, being of his own nature tenderly affected toward his friends, expecting that one day Herod would require him, for that he had delivered him from death whereunto he was condemned, and in danger likewise of the penaltie and punishment. He began therefore to consult with the Jews as touching his journey, who in way of duty and love came to visit him, and who besought him, and importuned him to abide with them, offering him all service and honour, assuring him that he should in no lesse maner be respected among them, then their high Priest and King; yea in farre higher regard then he might any waies be in his own countrey, by reason of the maim he had in his body through Antigonus tyranny: alleadging that Kings doe not ordinarily call to their remembrance those pleasures that they have received in their infant fortunes, because that with their estates they change both their maners and inclinations. But notwithstanding all these or such like allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawn from the desire he had to repaire homeward. Herod also wrote unto him, that he should require Phraates and the Jews that inhabited his kingdome, in no sort to envie his felicitie, in that he should partake with him both in dignity and royaltie, alleadging that the time was now come, wherein he might acknowledge the benefits he had received, by being heretofore nourished and preserved by him. With these letters he sent Samaralla likewise on an Embassage to Phraates furnished with great & rich presents, endeavouring by that means to winne him, that he in no sort should hinder his gratulation and good intent towards one that had so highly deserved at his hands: yet were not his protestations answerable to his pretence. For insomuch as he governed not with that uprightnesse which became a just King, he feared least some alteration might befall him, according to his demerits: for which cause he sought to get Hircanus under his power, or at leastwise to dispatch him out of his life, which he afterwards performed. When as therefore Herod had perswaded the Parthian to dismisse Hircanus, and the Jews to furnish him with money sufficient to bear his expence in his journey, he received him with all honour. In common assemblies he gave him alwaies the highest place, and in the time of festivals, he made him alwaies sit down before him; and the more closely to deceive him, he called him brother, endeavouring himself by all means wholly wholly to extinguish in him all colour and cause of suspicion of treachery: neither intermitted he any other stratagems, whereby in his opinion he might any waies further or promote his cause; and yet by these means occasioned he no small sedition in his own family. For carefully providing lest any one among the nobilitie should be established high Priest, he sent to Babylon for a certain man of base condition, called Ananel, and gave him the Priesthood. For which cause Alexandra grew suddenly displeased, not being able to endure that outrage. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexanders wife, who was King Aristobulus sonne, who had two children by her husband, the one wondrous beautifull, who was called Aristobulus: the other was Mariamme, who was likewise faire, and married to Herod. She was fore moved and highly displeased to see her sonne so much indignified, for that during his life another was called to the honour of high Priesthood: for which cause she wrote unto Cleopatra by the means of a certain Musitian, beseeching her to beg the high Priesthood at Antonius hands for her sonne. But for that Antonius made little reckoning of those suits, a certain friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Jewry about certain of his affairs, and who had seen Aristobulus, fell in love with him by reason of his beauty: and being abashed likewise at his great and goodly stature, and allured by Mariammes admirable beauty, he openly protested, that he accounted Alexandra a happy mother in her children: and devising to this effect with her, he perswaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius, for that if he should but behold them, he would refuse him in nothing, wherein he should request his friendship. Alexandra perswaded by these words, sent their pictures unto Antonius. Gellius also made the matter more wonderfull, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendred of no mortall straine, but by some divine power, labouring as much as in him lay, that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill becomming him to send for Mariamme, who was married to Herod, and desirous likewise to avoid Cleopatras suspicions, wrote unto Herod, that under some honest pretext he should send Alexandras sonne unto him (with this addition, if it might not seem troublesome unto him.) Which matter when Herod understood, he thought it no waies incident to his security to send Aristobulus, (who was a faire young man, and little more at that time then sixteen years old, and so nobly borne: considering that Antonius was at that present in such authoritie, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that, was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without fear of punishment in regard of his greatnesse and power. He therefore wrote him this answer, that if the young man should but onely depart out of the countrey, all the land would incontinently be filled with warre and troubles, for that the Jews pretended alteration in government, and sought to innovate by preferring a new King. When as therefore he had in this sort excused himself unto Antonius; he resolved to entertain both the younger Aristobulus and his mother Alexandra, with more respect. Moreover his wife Mariamme did continually importune him to give the Priesthood to her brother, alleadging that by that honour he might prevent the occasion of his travell. For which cause assembling his friends together in counsell, he grievously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that she secretly conspired against the Kingdome, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra, she laboured to dispossesse him of the soveraigntie, to the intent that her sonnes by Antonius means might govern in his stead. Which practice of hers was so much the more unjust, because she deprived her own daughter of that honour wherein she was inseated, and raised up troubles likewise in that kingdome which he had conquered with great travell, and extreame danger. Yet notwithstanding that he willingly forgot that which was past, and forgave those wrongs she had urged against him, and was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindnesse and courtesie both to her and hers. Furthermore, he gave the high Priesthood to young Aristobulus, alleadging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, then for that Aristobulus was under years.

After that he had thus seriously and considerately discoursed in the presence of the Ladies, and the consistory of his friends; Alexandra almost beside her selfe, not onely through the joy she had conceived by this unexpected good fortune, but also for the fear she had to be suspected, began to defend her self with tears and protestations, saying, that all whatsoever she had either practised or done, was to preferre her sonne unto the Priesthood whom she saw dishonoured: but as touching the Kingdome, that she had never pretended, neither would (if so be she should be persecuted therewith) receive the same, thinking her selfe for the present sufficiently honoured, both for that she saw Aristobulus in that estate, for the assurance that all her progeny should receive, in that he was lifted up in dignitie above the rest. Being therefore overcome by those merits, she accepted willingly the honour for her son, and

A and shewed her self obedient in all things, requesting him that if she had committed any thing rashly and through inconsideration of passion, either in respect of her children, or in unbridled courage of her tongue, he would be pleased to pardon her. After these debates and interchangeable discourses on either side, they shook hands the one with the other, in token of a more fixed and unfained friendship then was before, burying (as they then pretended) all evill suspicion or cause of unkindnesse.

CHAP. III.

HEROD preferreth ARISTOBULUS, his wife MARIAMMES brother, to the Priesthood; and afterwards putteth him to death.

B HEREUPON Herod took away the Priesthood instantly from Ananel, who was not that countreiman born (as we have heretofore declared) but was born amongst those Jews that inhabit and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Assyrians. For divers thousand Jews inhabit the countrey of Babylon; and from thence took he his originall also, being otherwise of the race of the Priests, and intirely affected toward Herod for a long time before, with whom he had familiar acquaintance. He had preferred him to this honour at such time as he was made King, and degraded him likewise to appease the troubles of his family; demeaning himself herein contrary to the law of the countrey: for whereas any one hath once been installed in that degree, he is never to be displaced. The first that transgressed this ordinance, was Antiochus Epiphanes, who dispossessed Iosab, and preferred his brother Onias to his place. The second was Aristobulus, who took it away from his brother Hircanus, and usurped himself. Herod was the third, who gave the Priesthood to Aristobulus, establishing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this means supposing that he had found out a remedy to appease the discords of his family, he notwithstanding all this, lived not without suspicion what event would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, lest demeaning her self in such sort as before-time she had done, she should seek occasion hereafter to raise new troubles. He commanded her therefore to contain her self within the royall palace, and to doe nothing of her own authoritie. Besides that he had appointed certain intelligencers, who should diligently observe that nothing should be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exasperated her hate, and increased the same against Herod, for being full of feminine pride, she disdained to see her self thus wrongfully suspected; desiring rather to suffer any thing, then to be deprived of the libertie of free speech; and under colour to be honoured, to live continually in servitude and fear. Whereupon she sent certain of her trustie friends to Cleopatra to complain, and lament unto her the importable miseries of her present estate, requiring her, according to her power, to give ready and speedy reliefe. Whereupon Cleopatra sent her word, that both she and her sonne should resort unto her into Egypt, with as great secrecie as might be possible. Upon which advice and the allowance thereof, she practised this policie. She caused two coffins to be made, such as men were wont to bury their dead in, in which she hid both her selfe and her sonne, commanding those servants of hers that were privie to her deliberation to carry them out in the night time, and to bend their course directly towards the sea, where there was a bark in readinesse prepared to shapé their course and convey them into Egypt. But Esop one of her household servants declared this enterprize of hers to Sabbion one of Alexandras friends, supposing that he had been made privie thereunto: who had no sooner inkling thereof, but (for that before-times he was Herods enemy, by reason he was suspected to have been one of those that sought to poyson Antipater) he determined by discovery of this secret flight, to convert Herods hate into assured friendship: and presently discovered Alexandras secret enterprize to the King. Who dissembling the matter untill it was upon the point of execution, surprised her at such time as she thought to flie, and yet notwithstanding he pardoned her that fault (in that he durst not decree any punishment against her, though he could have found in his heart to have used severitie) for that Cleopatra would not have contained her self, had she but had such an occasion offered her to expresse her hatred against Herod. For which cause, under the colour of a high and magnanimous spirit, he made shew to pardon her of his meere clemency: yet inwardly resolved he to make young Aristobulus away; yet not rashly upon the instant, lest the act should grow apparant and palpable.

festivall daies, intending both in himselfe, and in the presence and company of the people, to follow all kinde of pleasure and delight; yet did his envie incite him to hasten the execution of his will. Aristobulus was at that time some seventeen yeers old, who at such time as he approached the Altar to offer sacrifices, according to the law, apparelled in the high Priests ornaments to performe the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and goodly stature, surpassed the youngnesse and tendernesse of his yeers) expressing in his countenance the dignitie and nobility of his race, drew the eyes and good affection of all the people unto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobulus his grandfather. All the people therefore being surmounted by those their affections, and at that present time being all of them troubled with the joy they conceived, they brake out by little and little into happy acclamations, mixed with wishes and prayers: so that the good will the people bare to Aristobulus, discovered it self openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a kingdome) declared what evils they generally endured: For all which causes Herod concluded to execute that which he had heretofore complotted, and conceived against Aristobulus. As soon therefore as the feast was over-passed, he sojourned in Jericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he used Aristobulus with all kindnesse, to the end to draw him unto some place, where he feared nothing, playing also with him, and counterfeiting to sport, after the fashion of the young men, to gratifie him. Now, for that the place where they disported themselves, was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied, left their sport, and went out together to take fresh aire, and recovering a pleasant shade under certain arbours, and neer certain fish-pooles, which were largely spread round about, they beheld certain of their servants and friends that swom therein, with whom not long after Aristobulus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murther) laid hands on him and thrust him under the water, pretending to duck him in sport, and never gave him over, untill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This hapned about the evening, and after this manner died Aristobulus, after he had lived in all for the space of eighteen yeers, and administred the Priesthood one whole yeer: and after this, Ananias presently recovered his former dignitie.

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were suddenly devoured in tears, and transported with strange lamentations, which they spent over the dead body. All the city also was marvellously amared, neither was there any private family that thought not it self touched by this inconvenience, but imagined the losse in particular to concern himself, and no other. But above all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed, she was more passionate and perplexed then any other, being so much the more discomfited, for that she knew how all things had hapned. But the fear of a farre greater mischief constrained her to repress her passion, in such sort, that divers times she was ready to bereave her of her own life, and dispatch her self out of misery with her own hands. But she contained her self, to the end, that surviving (and living after her son, who was so traiterously and fraudulently slain, and prolonging her own life without giving any suspicion or shadow, that she supposed herself to be thus cursedly murdered) she might with more opportunitie expect the occasion to revenge her self: For which cause, she dissembled all things, governed her grief, and made shew that she knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all means to perswade the strangers, that this death had befallen Aristobulus without his knowledge; and did not onely prepare that which was requisite for the funerall; but vext himself likewise, and made shew of a man truly devoured in this sorrow: and it may be, that in remembrance of Aristobulus beauty and flourishing young yeers, he was truly touched with compassion, notwithstanding that he imagined that this death of his, should be a means of his intire securitie, demeaning himself in all things very circumspectly, with intent to purge himself of that crime. But especially he shewed his great magnificence in the interring of his body, both in the furnishing and preparation of the hearse, as in the perfumes and other things therunto belonging, in such sort, as the grief which the

She therefore certified Cleopatra by her private letters of Herods treasons, and her sons most miserable and untimely death: Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and having compa-

But although Herod was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatra as displeasure (for that she ceased not continually to provoke Antony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, and transported himself thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise doe) notwithstanding he left his uncle Ioseph behinde him, committing the government both of the Kingdome and his private estate unto him, giving him secret instructions to kill Mariamme, if so be that Antony should happen to doe him any mischief. For he loved her so extremely by reason of her beauty, that he supposed himself injured; if after his decease she should be beloved by any other; and he openly declared that all that misery which befell him, proceeded from Antonies passion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beauty, whereof he had beforetime heard some report. As soon therefore as he had in this sort disposed his affairs, notwithstanding he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Antony.

D But Ioseph governing that kingdome that was committed to his hands, conversed divers times upon this occasion with Mariamme, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publike profit sake, but also to doe her that honour which so great a Princeesse deserved. At such time therefore as he secretly devised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herod bare unto her, his speeches were jeasted at after the manner of Ladies; but especially flouted at by Alexandra. For which cause Ioseph, being over-forward to expresse the Kings good will towards her, proceeded so farre, that he discovered the commandement that was given him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herod to live without her, and that if any inconvenience should happen unto him, he would not in death also be dis-joynd from her. This discourse of Iosephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather as a manifestation of Herods malignitie; who dying, desired also that they should perish, and interpreted that which he had spoken, as the testimony of his tyrannous and malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour spread in the Citie of Jerusalem by Herods maligners, that Antony had in such sort tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the Kings house were troubled, and in especiall the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Ioseph to forsake the palace, and take the Ladies, and to retire himself under the ensignes of the Roman legion, who at that time were about the City for the securitie of the Kingdome, under the conduct of the Tribune Iulius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble should happen in the Kings house, they might be by this means in safetie, having the Romans to friend; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Antony should see Mariamme, she might obtain all things at his hands whatsoever she desired, assuring him that he would restore the Kingdome unto her, and deprive her of nothing that concerned, or was answerable to her royall estate.

A foolish rumour of Herods death.

F But whilest they were distracted with these deliberations, there came letters from Herod, contrary to some few mens report, and all mens expectation. For as soon as he came unto Antony he compassed his favour by his many presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Jerusalem, and suddenly debating the matter with him, he appeased him in such sort, as he was no more displeased against him: and from that time forward, Cleopatra speeches were but coldly conceited of in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Antony said, that there was no reason that a King should be answerable for that which he had done in his kingdome, for that in so doing, he should no more be King: but that when the honour is

festivall daies, intending both in himselfe, and in the presence and company of the people, to follow all kinde of pleasure and delight; yet did his envie incite him to hasten the execution of his will. Aristobulus was at that time some seventeen yeers old, who at such time as he approached the Altar to offer sacrifices, according to the law, apparelled in the high Priests ornaments to performe the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and goodly stature, surpassed the youngnesse and tendernesse of his yeers) expressing in his countenance the dignitie and nobility of his race, drew the eies and good affection of all the people unto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobulus his grandfather. All the people therefore being surmounted by those their affections, and at that present time being all of them troubled with the joy they conceived, they brake out by little and little into happy acclamations, mixed with wishes and prayers: so that the good will the people bare to Aristobulus, discovered it self openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a kingdome) declared what evils they generally endured: For all which causes Herod concluded to execute that which he had heretofore complotted, and conceived against Aristobulus. As soon therefore as the feast was over-passed, he sojourned in Jericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he used Aristobulus with all kindnesse, to the end to draw him unto some place, where he feared nothing, playing also with him, and counterfeiting to sport, after the fashion of the young men, to gratifie him. Now, for that the place where they disported themselves, was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied, left their sport, and went out together to take fresh aire, and recovering a pleasant shade under certain arbours, and neer certain fish-pooles, which were largely spread round about, they beheld certain of their servants and friends that swom therein, with whom not long after Aristobulus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murder) laid hands on him and thrust him under the water, pretending to duck him in sport, and never gave him over, untill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This hapned about the evening, and after this manner died Aristobulus, after he had lived in all for the space of eighteen yeers, and administred the Priesthood one whole yeer: and after this, Ananel presently recovered his former dignitie.

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were suddenly devoured in tears, and transported with strange lamentations, which they spent over the dead body. All the city also was marvellously amared, neither was there any private family that thought not it self touched by this inconvenience, but imagined the losse in particular to concern himself, and no other. But above all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed, she was more passionate and perplexed then any other, being so much the more discomfited, for that she knew how all things had hapned. But the fear of a farre greater mischief constrained her to repress her passion, in such sort, that divers times she was ready to bereave her of her own life, and dispatch her self out of misery with her own hands. CLEOPATRA thirsting after the kingdome of Arabia and Iewry; laboureth to beg a part of them at ANTONIES hands.

Alexandra certifieth Cleopatra of Herods treasons and her sons traitorous murders.

BUT none of all these things could either move or mollifie Alexandra, but that daily more & more she increased her sorrow, & in the heart of her tears kindled her wrath and heat with a desire of revenge. She therefore certified Cleopatra by her private letters of Herods treasons, and her sons most miserable and untimely death: Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and having compassion of her misery, undertook the matter, and ceased not to incite Antony to revenge Aristobulus death, telling him that it was an unpardonable error, that Herod being created King in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should be suffered to practise such conspiracies against the true and lawfull Kings. Antony perswaded by these her words (as soon as he came to Laodicea) sent for Herod, to the end that making his appearance, he might answer that which might be objected against him, as touching Aristobulus death: for he disliked the act, notwithstanding that Herod himself had attempted it. But although Herod was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatras displeasure (for that she ceased not continually to provoke Antony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, and transported himself thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise doe), notwithstanding he left his uncle Ioseph behinde him, committing the government both of the Kingdome and his private estate unto him, giving him secret instructions to kill Mariamme, if so be that Antony should happen to doe him any mischief. As soon therefore as he had in this sort disposed his affairs, notwithstanding he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Antony.

Herod ready to repair unto Antony, commaundeth Ioseph, to whose charge he committed the kingdome, to kill his wife.

But Ioseph governing that kingdome that was committed to his hands, conversed divers times upon this occasion with Mariamme, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publike profit sake, but also to doe her that honour which so great a Princeesse deserved. At such time therefore as he secretly devised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herod bare unto her, his speeches were jeasted at after the manner of Ladies; but especially flouted at by Alexandra. once given him, he hath the authoritie likewise left him, to use his regall power. Urging further, that it concerned Cleopatra likewise her self, not to search too curiously into the affairs and government of kingdomes. Herod certified all this by his letters, and signified further what other honours he had received at Antonies hands in assenblyes and feasts, to which he invited him alwaies; notwithstanding that Cleopatra seemed to be displeased therewith, detracting him; and being desirous to get the kingdome of Jewry into her hands, strove by all means possible to put him to death: but that he had found Antony alwaies an upright man, and feared not henceforward that any evill should befall him: and returning presently upon this, he brought with him a more ample testimony of Antonies most assured affection, both in respect of his own Kingdome, as of his particular affairs. And as touching Cleopatra, she pretended not to seeke any further then that which she had; because that Antony had given her Coelosyria in stead of that which she had demanded, forbearing thence-forward to mention Jewry any more, because that Antony wholly rejected those suites.

Joseph and Mariamme

Herod.

After these letters came unto their hands, the trouble and disturbance wherein they were, and the desire to retire unto the Romans, as if Herod had bin dead, was wholly extinguished. Yet was not this their resolution hidden from the king; but that Herod, after he had brought Antony on his way (who at that time set forward in his wars against the Parthians) he returned into Jewry. Upon his arrivall, his sister Salome, and his mother certified him exactly of Alexandras intent, and the determination of her friends. Salome likewise spake against Joseph her husband, and slandered him, objecting against him that he had Mariammes company. All which she spake through the malice she had long time conceived against him, for that in a certain debate Mariamme had in her rage despitfully hit them in the teeth with their obscure birth. Herod (who was alwaies inflamed with the earnest affection which he bare unto his wife Mariamme) was suddenly troubled hereat: and although jealousie pressed him forward, yet love restrained him and kept him from doing any thing rashly; through passion or affection: for which cause he called Mariamme aside, and demanded of her in secret, what familiar company she had kept with Joseph? She by solemn oathes and by all possible allegations in her own defence appeased the King by little and little, and pacified his choler. For in such sort was he transported with the love that he bare unto his wife, that he beleaved she had sufficiently purged her self of those slanders, that had been enforced against her; yeelding her most hearty thanks for her honest affection towards him, and declaring unto her openly the great esteem and love that he bare unto her. Finally (as it often falleth out amongst lovers) they fell to tears, and embraced each other with great affection: for that she gave him no credit, he endeavoured the more to draw her to believe. Whereupon Mariamme said unto him: It is not the act of a lover to have given commandement, that if any thing should befall thee otherwaies then well with Antony, I should presently be done to death with thee; notwithstanding I have no waies offended thee. No sooner were these words out of her mouth, but the King entred into a strange passion, and giving over his embraces, he cried out with a loud voice and tore his haire, saying, that he had a most evident prooffe that Joseph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not have discovered those things which had been spoken to him in secret, except they had greatly trusted the one the other: and in this emotion or rage of jealousie hardly contained he himselfe from killing his wife. But the force of love overcame him so much, that he bridled his rage, notwithstanding it were irksome and grievous unto him. Yet gave he order that Joseph should be slain, without either audience or justification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandra, who was the cause of all these troubles, he kept her prisoner.

About the same time there grew certain troubles and alterations in Syria: for that Cleopatra continually solicited and importuned Antony, and whetted on his displeasure against all, perswading him to remove all from their governments, and to bestow the same on her selfe. And for that Antony loved her extremely, she was in great estimation and credit with him: and being in her own nature inclined to covetousnesse, she abstained from no kinde of corrupt dealing and wickednesse. For knowing that the kingdome should descend unto her brother, she caused him to be poisoned, when as he was but fifteen yeeres old: as for her sister Antioch, she caused her to be slain by Antonies means at such time, as she made her prayers in the Temple of Diana in Ephesus. Moreover, in what place soever she understood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples, or in breaking open sepulchres, she would be possessed thereof: neither was there any religious place so sacred, from whence she took not away the ornaments. Furthermore, there was not any thing so prophane and interdicted, which she laid not hands on to satiate her unbridled avarice. Neither

A ther was the whole world sufficient enough to content this magnificent Lady, who was made slave to her own desires; and her disordinate appetite was such, that all the riches in the world were not able to satisfy and fill the same. For this cause she incessantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberall towards her: and therefore entring into Syria with him, she presently bethought her self how she might get it into her possession. For she caused Lysaneas Ptolemys sonne to be put to death, objecting against him that he had private intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Jewry also at Antonius hands, and required him besides that, to dispossesse the Kings of Arabia. He was in such sort possessed by this woman, that he seemed not onely to be bewitched with her words, but also enchanted by her poysons, to obey her in whatsoever she thought meet: yet was he ashamed to commit so manifest an iniquitie, for fear lest being so farre over-ruled by her, he should happen to offend in matters of more consequence. Lest therefore either by denying her, he should draw her to discontent; or by condescending to her demands, he should seeme to be the wickedest man alive, he deducted a severall portion of both their dominions, and presented her with the same. He gave her likewise those Cities that are situate between the floud Elutherius and Egypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free Cities of long continuance: although by earnest sollicitation she thought to be seized of these also.

CLEOPATRAS progresse in Iudaea.

C AFTER that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as farre as Euphrates, who at that time went to make war in Armenia: she returned back again, and by the way visited Apamea and Damasco, and at last took her progresse into Jewry: Where King Herod met with her, and assured that portion which had been given unto her in Arabia, with all the revenews of Jericho unto her. This countrey bringeth forth that balme, which of all other oymments is the most precious, and onely groweth in that place, and no other, to the bignesse of great Dates. Being arrived in that place, and grown inwardly familiar with Herod, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust, being of her self naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance; and haply also being somewhat touched with love, or rather (as it seemeth most likely) she in this sort laid the foundation to intrap him, under colour to revenge her self of some outrage by that means. But in effect she generally manifested, that she was overcome by her desire and sensuall lust; But Herod was not over-kindly bent towards Cleopatra; knowing of long time how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time he conceived the greater hatred against her, because by that intemperance of hers she pretended to destroy him: and although that from the beginning he had rejected her sollicitations; yet determined he to revenge himself on her, if so be by these her subtil underminings she should prosecute and continue her subtil policies to betray him. He asked counsell also of his friends, whether having her in his possession, he should put her to death. For in so doing, all those should be delivered from divers evils, whom either in time past she had molested, or hereafter should bring in trouble. Moreover, that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessitie should enforce him to make triall of her friendship. But whilest he debated and discoursed upon this resolution, his friends restrained and dissuaded him; assuring him that it was a great indignitie for him, who was a Prince of high thoughts and haughty resolutions, to cast himself into manifest perill, beseeching him to attempt nothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same; notwithstanding it might be approved that it stood with his profit: nay, rather that by this means he should encrease his desire, for that by force and subtiltie he might seeme to have lost her. Further, that no one colour of excuse should be left him, in that she was the woman of greatest note and nobilitie of that time; and that whatsoever profit might redound unto him by her death, should be annexed with Antonius injurie. Whereby it most evidently appeared, how great and remediable damages would befall both to the kingdome and the Kings family also; whereas nothing letted him by repulsing her unlawfull demand, to dispose all things for the present state with great discretion. By these and such like reasons and probable conjectures, they deterred and dissuaded him from adventuring upon his apparant danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich presents; and to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

As soon therefore as Antonius was seized of Armenia, he sent Artabazes, Tigranes sonne, with all his children, who were great Princes, prisoners into Egypt, and presented them to

Cleopatra, with all those precious Jewels likewise, which were taken by him, or found in the kingdome. But Artaxias his elder son (who at that time had saved himself by flight) reigned in Armenia: whom Arabelans and Nero the Emperour drove out of his kingdome; and placed his younger brother Tigranes in his roome, as it shall be declared hereafter. As for the tributes of the countries which Herod was bound to pay unto Cleopatra, for the lands bestowed on her by Antonius, he without deceit justly paid them, supposing it to be very incident to his securitie, to continue himself in her good favour. As for the Arabians, they seeing that Herod had the levying of such a tribute, paid him for some little time two hundredth talents a yeer; but afterwards they grew slow and negligent in their payments, and scarcely satisfied the half, and that also very negligently.

CHAP. VI.

HEROD maketh warre with ARETAS at the same time that ANTONIUS is overthrown by AUGUSTUS CAESAR in the Actian warre.

ARETAS demeaning himself thus ungratefully, and refusing to doe that which in right he ought to performe, Herod made a shew to take arms against him, but deferred his revenge in regard of the contentions amongst the Romans. For at that time nought else was expected then the Actian warre (which fell in the hundredth, eighty and seventh Olympiade) in which Augustus Caesar determined to trie his title with Antonius for the Monarchie. In the mean while Herod, who had already for many yeers been Master of a peaceable and fruitfull countrey, from whence he drew rich revenews and many forces, gathered divers companies of men, with the greatest expedition that he might, to succour Antonius. But he by letters signified unto him, that he had no need of his assistance: notwithstanding he commanded him to make a road upon the Arabian, whose perfidious dealing Antonius had not onely understood by Herod himself, but also by *Cleopatra*s advertisements. For she very cunningly conceived, that it would redound unto her profit, if one of these two should overthrow the other. Herod according to these instructions from Antonius, returned back into his countrey, and retained his army alwaies ready about him, and incontinently with the same invaded Arabia, and with his forces both horsemen and footmen came directly to Diospolis, where the Arabians (having notice of his intended warre against them) came out to meet him. In this place fought they a most cruell battell, wherein at last the Jews had the upper hand. After this, a great army of Arabians assembled themselves at Cana, a certain place in Coelosyria. Whereof when Herod was fore-advertised, he marched forth against them, accompanied with the greater part of his forces. As soon as he drew neer to Cana, he determined to incampe in that place, and after he had well fortified and entrenched his forces, to set on the enemy upon the first opportunitie: but whilest he employed himself in the execution hereof, all the army of the Jews cried out, requiring him without delay, to leade them forward against the Arabians. And thus highly were they encouraged, both in respect of the confidence they had in the good administration and ordering of their army, as in regard of their forwardnes, who had been actors in the former warre, and partakers of the victory; so that they scarce gave their enemy leisure to settle themselves to their weapons. When as therefore Herod perceived that the heat and forwardnesse of the souldiers could hardly be appeased, he thought good to make use of the readinesse of his army, and arming himself he marched formost, being seconded by his souldiers in battell array, with a souldier-like march. This sudden approach of his wonderfully abashed the Arabians: For although for a while they made head against them, yet perceiving their enemies full of heart, and themselves unable to resist them, divers of them retreated and betook themselves to flight: so that all of them had been utterly defeated, had not Athenis endamaged Herod and the Jews. For he having the command of that army which Cleopatra had in that place; and besides that, bearing a privie grudge towards Herod, disposed his army in a readinesse, and expecting the event of the battell, resolved with himself to containe his forces if the Arabians overcame the Jews; and if so be they had the worst (as indeed it came to passe) to set upon the Jews, who should be spent by that time; and surprizing them at unawares even in the height of their hope of good hap, to massacre and slaughter them with his fresh supplies. When as therefore the Jews had spent all their strength against their professed enemies, and expected nothing lesse then the assurance of the victory, he charged and overcame them who had retreated into certain rough and difficult places (whereunto their enemies were better accustomed then themselves) where being grievously wounded and ill intreated by the Arabians, who returned back and set upon them, divers of them that fled were slain, and died sundry kindes of death, and of those that escaped, few of them recovered the campe. Herod losing the hope of this battell, poasted on horseback as fast as he might, to bring on fresh supplies: but notwithstanding all his expedition and diligence, yet could he not recover the place in due time, but that the campe of the Jews was taken and sacked, and the Arabians obtained no small good hap beyond their expectation, becoming Lords of that victory which was wholly unexpected by them, and wherein they slew a great number of their enemies. From that time forward, Herod began to make certain incursions and roades into Arabia, preying the countrey, and doing them much mischief. He incamped himself likewise upon the mountains, forbearing to draw his whole forces into the field, notwithstanding by his diligence and industry in travell, his labours were not fruitlesse, but that prevailing in some exploits, he fought out all means to abolish and put away the ignominy of his former discomfiture.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Earthquake that hapned in Jewry.

In such time as Cæsar and Antony made trial of their titles in the Actian warre, and in the seventh year of the reign of King Herod, there hapned such an earthquake in the countrey of Judæa, that never the like was seen in any other place: so that divers beasts were slain thereby, and many men were overwhelmed with the ruines of their houses, and perished to the number of ten thousand. Onely

the men of warre received no damage, because they encamped in the open field. The Arabians hearing tidings hereof (which were farre greater by report, then they were in effect, by such, who in favour of the Arabians, and hate of the Jews, reported the same) waxed proud: yea so much was their courage increased hereof, as if all the Cities of Jewry had been already overthrown, and the men thereof extinguished, and as if they had no adversaries remaining alive to contradict them. For which cause laying hold of those Embassadors of the Jews, who came unto them to intreat of peace in their desperate estates, they slew them, and afterwards in the heat of their spleen, set upon their enemies campe. But the Jews not daring to expect or prevent their assault, for their present miseries had dejected their mindes, seemed to neglect their Common-weale, and in manner to despaire of their safety. These thus affected did the King encourage, and called unto him their Captains, and (as much as in him lay) awaking and reviving their drooping spirits, and when he had restored those of better hope, to more successfull good hap, at length he attempted to speak unto all the armie, who in the former overthrow, would yeeld no respect or allowance to perswasion. These did he both comfort and exhort in such manner, as followeth.

CHAP. VIII.

HERODS Oration to his army.

FRIENDS and fellow souldiers, there is not one of you but knoweth at this time, there are so many present and impendent misfortunes attending our estates, as are able to wearie and amaze those men, that are of the greatest resolution. But sith we must needs fight, and that all those things that have befallen us unto this present, are of that kinde, that by your own vertue and magnanimity they may be recovered, I have resolved to inform, and confirm you in those means, whereby you may retain and continue your accustomed valour and noble courage. First of all therefore I will approve unto you (as touching our warre) that it consisteth on just grounds, for that we are enforced therunto through the outrage of our enemies: the knowledge whereof should chiefly make you recover your courage. Secondly, I will apparantly approve unto you, that our estates are not so desperate, but that we have great and assured hopes to obtain the victory. First of all therefore, I will discourse of that which formerly I proposed, and will make your selves judges of those things which I will discourse upon. For your selves are privy to the Arabians injustice, and how perfidious they are to their friends, and impious and barbarous towards all men; but in especiall, they have alwayes troubled us, provoking us through their extreme avarice and malignant envie, with perpetuall injuries. And yet to let slip all other our benefits to that nation, who is he that delivered them from their imminent perill and thralldome, that was hazarded by Cleopatra's means, but our selves? For the friendship I had with Antony, and his benevolence towards me, was the cause that their burthen of miserie was so lightned; for that Antony forbore to commit any thing that might draw us to suspition.

Besides, after she had wrought him by her sollicitation to cut off certain portions of the two kingdomes to be given unto her, the matter was so handled by me, that by divers presents particularly bestowed upon him by my hands, I have obtained security for us both, and by disbursing two hundred talents of mine own, and giving my word for two hundred more for others, for the renewes of that very land which in times past was ours, and these now possesse and enjoy. Notwithstanding, reason it were in my opinion, that we that are Jews should not be tributaries, or give any portion of our countrey to any man; and if we must needs do it, it ill becometh us to pay it for these, who enjoy their lives by our means. It should not be reasonable for the Arabians, who after they had confessed with many plausible protestations and thanksgivings, that they enjoy their liberties by our benefit, to have deprived and thrust us from our own, and to have unjustly dealt with us; yea even with us, I say, who were not their enemies, but rather on the contrary side their chiefeft friends in the time of peace. And if fidelity should be respected even amongst those that are our most hated enemies, much more necessarily ought it to be observed by those that are friends. But these men set light thereby, who think nothing honest, but that which is annexed with lucre; and think no wrong unexcusable, nor unpunish injury, that hath but a shew of profit. Is there any question then, whether we should chastise these unjust men by a just warre? sith both God commandeth no lesse, and enjoyneth us alwayes to hate outrage, and revenge injustice, especially in that warre, which is not onely just, but necessary? For that which both in the confession of the Grecians, and opinion of the Barbarians is most hatefull and hainous, this have they perpetrated in murdering our Embassadors. For the Greeks say, that Embassadors are sacred and inviolable, and we our selves have received our most wholsome and holiest precepts of the Law of God by Angels, that is, from his Heraulds and messengers: for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile enemy to enemy.

With whomsoever justice
is, there is God also.

What impietie therefore is more unpardonable, then to put those Embassadors to death, who bring tidings of right and justice? or what prosperitie can they expect either in their warres or felicitie in their whole lives, after so hainous a crime? Truly I cannot imagine any: But perhaps some man will say, that right and equitie is on our side, but that the greater number of men and meanes are with them: but this their speech is unworthy of my followers. For with those, with whom justice is, with those also is God; and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let us wade further, and weigh our own forces by themselves. In the first battell we had the victory: in the second, upon the first charge we put them to flight, and found them unable to make their partie good against us. Afterwards, when the victory was ours, behold, Athenia, not by lawfull warre, but by subtill treacherie assaulted us. But shall this be called their fortitude, or rather their fraud and second iniquitie? why therefore should we have lesse courage, who ought to have the greater confidence? or why should we fear them, who are alwaies inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraud; and when they seem to overcome, they do it by injustice?

Moreover, if any man suppose them to be valiant, this should the rather incite them more and more unto vertue, for it is no honour for a generous and noble minde to overcome his inferiour, but to have means and might to conquer his superiour. And if any one be terrified by our domestick and homebred miseries, and by our late earthquake, first of all let him think with himself, that he erreth in that which deceiveth the Arabians, by supposing the same to be more grievous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it becometh them not to draw matter of fear from thence, whence the other took occasion of courage. For as touching themselves, they conceive not any hope thorow any good that is in themselves, but onely in the trust they have that we are already dejected by our calamities. But when they shall see us march forth against them, their courage will be weakened, and our confidence by this means shall be awakened, for that we are not at this time to encounter with desperate men: For neither are we overmuch afflicted, neither (as some think) hath this miserie befallen us thorow Gods displeasure, but these are the casualties of fortune. And if by the will of God these things are come to passe, it is marvell if by the same will our calamitie cease not, and that our punishment should not satisfie his displeasure. But that this present warre is approved by him for just, he himself hath evidently declared. For whereas divers thorow the whole region, have been oppressed by the earthquake, none of you that bear arms have incurred any mischief, but all of you have been preserved, which is a manifest token of the will of God, and if your children and wives had generally followed the warres as you do, none of you should have been wanting. When as therefore you shall have bethought

A bethought your selves of these things, and moreover in regard that God hath at all times an especiall care over you, fail not to pursue this injurious Nation with a just warre, that neither respecteth the laws of friendship, nor keepeth the league of covenant; valiant in murdering sacred Embassadors; and abject and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour.

The year of the world, 3935. before Christs birth, 29.

B These perswasions of his did not a little encourage the Jews to the battell, and made them more forward then before. As for Herod, after he had offered sacrifice, according to the custome, he drew his army forth, and led them with great confidence against the Arabians, and passing Jordan, he encamped neer unto the enemy, with an intent to surprize a fort situate between them both: making this account that it would further him much, either if upon the present he should be drawn forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march onward, for that this place should serve him to encamp in with more security. The same resolution also had the Arabians, for which cause they fell to skirmish in that place, wherein the first on both sides that gave the charge, and afterwards some other followers were slain: so that those of the Arabians side being overcome, betook them to retreat. This successe of theirs bred no little hope in the Jews, who seeing the enemies army addressed to attempt any thing rather then to fight, waxed the more hardy to assail the Arabian in his trenches, and beat him from his camp. They being forced by these assaults, drew forward to their defence in great disorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them: yet notwithstanding they defended themselves, both in regard of their great number, as also in respect of that necessity whereunto they were inforced by the Jews. The skirmish on both sides was C hot, and divers on either party were put to the sword: but in the end, the Arabians being put to the worst, turned their backs. The slaughter was so great, that they not onely perished by their enemies swords, but they themselves also murdered one another in the presse, and disorderly flight, in which they were trodden under foot, and lay slaughtered in a maner by their own weapons. So that in that discomfiture there died some five thousand: the rest hastily fled on the other side of the rampire: but being overpressed with want of victuals, and in especiall with lack of water, they had not any ground or assurance to escape. After them posted the Jews, and being unable to recover the fortresse with them, they begirt the camp with a siege, and shut up all the passages that no succour could come unto them, and took D from them all opportunitie to escape, although they should affect flight.

The Arabians are overcome by Herod.

When as therefore they saw themselves reduced into such extremity, they sent Embassadors unto Herod, first of all to demand a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppressed with thirst, to crave some remedie for their present necessities. But he neither respected the Embassadors, neither the proffered ranome for the captives, nor any other whatsoever reasonable demand, desiring earnestly to revenge himself of those injurious treacheries they had practised against his Embassadors. Being therefore inforced by thirst (which amongst other plagues most grievously afflicted them) many of them forsook their trenches, and offered themselves to bonds, and to be led away captives; so that within five dayes space four thousand of them yeelded themselves prisoners. On the sixth day, all the rest determined to fall out, and assail the enemy, rather making choice of assured death, then thus lingeringly and ignominiously to pine away. When as therefore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their trenches; but like unapt souldiers for a skirmish, decayed not onely in body, but in minde, reputing their death for advantage, to escape thereby their extreame misfortunes. For which cause upon the first onset, about some seven thousand of them were slain: and thus the fiercenesse of this Nation being allayed by this overthrow, they submitted themselves to Herod, whom to their own sorrow they had approved to be a valiant souldier.

HIRCANUS to death.

HEROD puffed up with his successfull good fortune, returned back into his own countrey, having obtained great estimation and reputation by his valour and vertue. But at such time as he supposed his state to be most assured, he grew in danger both to lose his dignity and life, by reason of that victory that Caesar obtained against Antony in the Actian warre. For at that time he not onely supposed himself to be utterly overthrown, but both his friends and enemies that were round about about him lost their hopes, for that it was unlikely that he should escape unpunished, who had been so inwardly united in friendship with Antony. Whereby it came to passe, that his friends in no sort concealed their despair, and his enemies under their colourable and dissembled griefs, covered their joy, promising themselves thereafter a better and more pleasing administration of the common-weal. Hereupon Herod perceiving, that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the blood royall alive, determined to cut him off, resolving with himself, that if he hapned to escape the danger, that a man who at that time was more worthier the kingdome then himself, should not entermeddle amongst his affairs: and if any misfortune should behold him in regard of Cesar, he desired to dispossesse Hircanus of the kingdome, in regard of the envy which he bare him, for that he was the onely man who deserved to be advanced to that dignitie. Whilest thus he was tormented and travelled in his thoughts, he had an occasion offered him by Hircanus own followers to execute his intention. For Hircanus being of a milde and gentle nature, during all his life-time forbore to entermeddle with state affairs, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himself with whatsoever condition it pleased her to allot him.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, and unable to conceal with modestie the hope she conceived of change, solicited her father that he should not any longer endure the subjection of Herod, who was the very scourge of their familie, but rather that he should stand upon his own guard, and reserve himself to his better hoped fortunes. She furthermore gave him counsell to write unto Malchus, who had the government of Arabia, requesting him to grant him both protection and entertainment, for that if Herod should chance to be cut off by Casars displeasure, doubtlesse the kingdome would return unto him, both in regard of his nobilitie, as also of the peoples favour. These perswasions of hers Hircanus at the first repulsed, but afterwards being overcome by the importunitie of the woman, who ceased not day and night to sing the same song of future hope, and of Herods treasons, he gave certain letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherein he required him to send him certain horsemen, who might conduct him to the Asphaltire lake, which lieth distant from the confines of Jerusalem some three hundred furlongs. And therefore especially committed he these letters to Dositheus trust, both for that he favoured Hircanus and his daughter, and seemed likely for divers causes to hate Herod: for he was Iosephs kinsman, who was slain by Herod; and not long before, certain of his brothers were slain amongst others at Tyre by Antonies command: yet for none of these occasions continued he faithfull to Hircanus. For he setting more by the present favour of the king that then reigned, then the rest, discovered the letter unto the King: who first of all giving him thanks, required one office of friendship more at his hands; which was, that folding up the letter, and sealing it, he should convey and deliver the same to Malchus, and return his answer, for that it meerly concerned him, if he knew his resolution also. Which when Dositheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this answer, that he was ready to entertain both himself and his whole family, and all those Jews likewise which were of his faction, promising to send him a band of souldiers, who should be able to conduct him safely thither, and should be obedient to his command in all things. Now as soon as Herod was seized of these letters, he called for Hircanus, and demanded of him whether he had any confederacie with Malchus: who denied the same. But Herod protesting and bringing forth his letter in an open assembly, commanded him afterwards to be put to death. Thus are these matters registred in Herods commentaries: for by some are they delivered otherwise, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which he had committed, but for some treasons against the King. For they write to this effect, that Herod at a certain banquet (dissembling his suspicion) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had received any letters from Malchus: and that he answered, that he had received letters, but such as contained nothing else but officious salutations. Further, that another asked him, whether he had received any present thetewithall: and when he had answered, that he had received nothing but four couriers for his saddle: the King wrested this to a capitall offence of corruption and treason, and commanded him presently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltlesse, they alledge this for a most approved argument; namely, his gentle disposition, who even in his youthfull yeers never gave signe or appearance of rashnesse, or pride, or signification of audaciousnesse, no not even then when he had the royall government in his hands, but in that freedome of authoritie, disposed the most things by Antipaters advice. But at that time he was more then fourscore yeers old, and knew that Herods estate was secured: and passing Euphrates also, and living on the other side of the river, he left such as held him in great honour, & returned home into his own country, to the end he might live under Herods government. Whereby it is lesse likely, that he would attempt any alteration, so farre different from his nature, so that all these things seem to be fained by Herod.

Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and adverse fortune, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For at such time as his mother Alexandra lived, he was created high Priest of the Jews, and obtained that honour for the space of nine years: and after his mothers death, he had scarcely governed the kingdome for the space of three monerhs, but that he was expelled by his brother Aristobulus, and afterwards restored by Pompeys assistance, and receiving all his former honours, he lived in full possession of them for the space of fourty years. After this he was once more distastd by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, lived certain yeers in captivitie among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though he had many things promised him by Herod, yet after so many alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands, and that which amongst all the rest is most of all to be lamented, as we have said, he was unjustly put to death, an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a lover of justice, and an observer of perpetuall modestie, and governed his kingdome for the most part by other mens direction, being onely guiltie in himself of ignorance and the love of idlenesse. Truly, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodnesse obtained their so great riches: for which deserts of his, against all law and right, he was cruelly put to death.

But Herod after Hircanus death, addrest himself to perform his journey towards Caesar, and having little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendship with Antonius, he grew desperately jealous of Alexandra, for fear lest she taking opportunitie of the time, should incite the people to rebell, and fill the kingdome with domesticall sedition: for which cause, committing the government or the estate to his brother Phelorus, he left his mother Cypros, his sister, and all his kindred in the castle of Maffada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune should befall him, he should retain the kingdome in his own hands and maintain it. As for his wife Mariamme, for that by reason of certain dislikes betwixt her, his mother, and sister, they might not live together, he left her with her mother in the castle of Alexandria, and committed them to the custody of his Treasurer Ioseph, and Sabemus the Iturian, and with her the keeping of his Castles, both which had alwayes been his faithfull friends, and to whom in way of honour, he committed the custodie of these princely Ladies. But he gave them also this commandment; that if they should be certified that any sinister mishap had befallen him, they should presently kill them both, and to the utmost of their power, continue the kingdome in his children, and his brother Phelorus.

CHAP. X.

How HEROD obtained the kingdome of Judea at CAESARS hands.

AFTER he had in this sort given order for all his affairs, he withdrew himself unto Rhodes, intending there to meet with Caesar. And as soon as he arrived in that City, he took the Diadem from his head, and laid it apart, but as for his other princely ornaments, he changed them in no sort; and being admitted to Caesars presence, he at that time gave a more ample testimony of the greatnesse of his magnanimity and courage: for neither addrest he his speech to intreat his favour (according to the custome of suppliants) neither presented he any request, as if he had in any sort offended him, but gave account of all that which he had done, without concealing or mistrusting any thing. For he freely confessed before Caesar, that he had intirely loved Antonius, and that to the utmost of his power he had done him service, to the end that he might obtain the sovereignty and monarchy; not by annexing his forces unto his, in that he was otherwise employed in the Arabian warre; but in furnishing him both with wheat and money, and that this was the least office which it behoved him to perform towards Antonius; for that being once his professed friend, it behoved him not onely to imploy his best endeavours on his so princely benefactor, but also to hazard both his head and happinesse to deliver him from perils. All which (said he) I have not performed according as I ought to have done, yet notwithstanding I know, that at such time as he was overcome in the Actian battell, I did not alter my affection with his fortune: neither did I restrain my self, for although I befriended not Antonius with my presence and assistance in the Actian warre, yet at leastwise I assisted him with my counsell, certifying him that he had but one onely means left him for his security, and prevention of his utter ruine, which was, to put Cleopatra to death,

Herod cometh to Caesar, and declareth unto him what pleasures he had done Antony, promising him no lesse duty and love, if so be he might be received into his favour.

for that by cutting her off, he might enjoy her estate, & might more easily obtain his peace, and pacifie thy displeasure against him. And for that he gave but slender regard to these mine admonitions by his own sottishnesse and indiscretion, he hath hurt himself and profited you, because, as I said, he did not follow my counsell. Now therefore (O Caesar) in regard of the hate which you bear unto Antony, you condemne my friendship also. I will not deny that which I have done; neither am I afraid freely & publicly to protest how much I have loved him: but if without regard of persons, you consider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, and how resolute and constant a friend I am, and how mindfull of kindnesse, the effect of that which I have done, may make me known unto thee. For if the name be onely changed, the friendship notwithstanding may remain, and deserve a due praise.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 8.
Caesar confirmeth Herods authority.

Herod conducteth Caesar toward Egypt, and presenteth him with many sumptuous gifts.
Herod entertaineth both Caesar and his army very heroically.

By these words (which were manifest testimonies of his resolute and noble courage) he so inwardly indeared himself unto Caesar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he converted this his accusation into an occasion to winne and work him to be his friend: for which cause Caesar, in setting the Diademe upon his head, exhorted him that he should no lesse respect his friendship, then he had in former time Antony: and withall, did him much honour, certifying him moreover, that Capidius had written unto him, how much Herod had assisted him in his warres that he had with the Monarchs of Syria. Herod seeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the kingdome was more surely confirmed unto him, then beforetime, both by Caesars bounty, and also by the decree of the Senate, which he had practised to obtain for his greater assurance, accompanied Caesar as farre as Aegypt, presenting both himself and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his estate: endeavouring by these means both to winne their favours, and to shew also the greatnesse of his courage, requiring moreover at Caesars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Antonyes dearest friends, might not be sought out to be punished: yet notwithstanding he could not obtain the same, by reason of an oath that Caesar had past before he solicited him. That done, he returned back again into Jewry, with more greater honour and assurance, then before; whereby he strook them with wonderfull amazement, who expected his contrary successe, as if by Gods especiall providence he alwayes over-went his dangers, to his great honour. Incontinently therefore, he prepared himself to entertain Caesar, who returned out of Syria to take his journey into Aegypt, and received him at Ptolemais, with all royall honour, and gave his army presents with all abundance of munition: so that he was accounted for one of Caesars most affectionate friends, and rode about with him, at such time as he took the view of his army: he entertained him also and his friends with one hundred and fifty men, adorned with most rich and sumptuous apparrell. And for that they were to passe thorow a countrey, wherein there was great scarcity of water, he furnished them both with water and wine; so that they needed neither of them. He gave Caesar also eight hundreth talents, and so royally satisfied he all men, that they confessed themselves to have had farre greater entertainment, then the reveñues and profits of his kingdome could afford them. By which means he gave the more ample testimonie of his forward friendship, and free affection to deserve well: and making use of the opportunitie of the time, he obtained the reputation of a Prince of an heroick and noble spirit; so that he was held inferior unto no man, for the good entertainment that he gave to the chiefeft Romans in their return out of Aegypt.

Herod giveth Caesar eight hundreth talents.

CHAP. IX.

Mariamme & Alexandra displeased with Herod.

BUT as soon as he returned into his kingdome, he found all his household troubled, and both his wife Mariamme and her mother Alexandra grievously displeased with him. For they supposed (and not without cause) that they were not shut up in that Castle for their securities sake, but as it were in a prison; so that, in as much as they neither might make use of other mens, nor enjoy their own goods, they were highly discontented. Mariamme also supposed that her husband did but dissemble his love, rather for his own profit & commodity, then for any intire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieved her, then that she had not any hope to live after him: if so be he should happen to die, especially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could she ever forget what commandment before that time he had left with Ioseph; so that by all means possible, she laboured to win the affections of those that had the charge of her, and especially

A especially Sohemus, knowing very well that her safetie depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaved himself very wisely and faithfully, containing himself very circumspectly within the bounds of his commission; but after these Ladies had with prettie presents and feminine flatteries mollified and wrought him by little and little, at last he blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him; especially, for that he hoped not that he should return with the same power and authoritie, which before he had: and for that cause he thought thus in himself, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be deprived of that dignitie wherein they were at that time; but would return them the like kindnesse when Mari- amme should be Queene, or next unto the King. Furthermore, he hoped that if Herod also should return with all things answerable to his desires, that he would perform nothing without his wives consent; or upbraid him with the act, if shee contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loved her in such sort, as it was impossible to equall or expresse his affections; and for these causes he disclosed the trust that was committed unto him. But Mari- amme was very sore displeased to heare that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether united and tied to the dangers of Herod; and shee oftentimes wished that he might never more return again in safetie, supposing that her life with him should be very intolerable: all which she afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herod beyond all expectation arrived in his countrey, being adorned with mightie fortune, he first of all, as it became him, certified his wife of his good tidings and happy successe, whom onely amongst all other his friends and wives, he embraced and saluted, for the pleasing conversation and affection that was in her. But shee, whilest he repeated unto her these fortunate events of his affaires, rather entertained the same with a displeasing attention, then applauding joy; and these affections of hers likewise she could not conceale. For at such time as he folded his armes about her necke, she unfolded her sorrow in her sighes, so simple and unfained were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased then appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was sore troubled, perceiving these things nor opely suspected, but also fully manifest: but above all things he was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparent hatred that his wife had conceived against him, which in such sort incensed him, that he could not resist the love that had attained him, so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace; and being D unresolved in himself, he now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrary affection: so much was his minde travelled betweene love and hatred, that when as oftentimes he desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by loves mediation failed him in the enterprise. For nothing did more torment him then this feare, lest executing his displeasure against her, he should by this meanes more grievously wound himself, through the desire he bare unto his deceased delight. Whilest thus he was sweltered and devoured in his passions, and conceived sinister opinions against Mariamme his wife, Salome his sister, and his mother having an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunitie to expresse and execute their hatred towards Mariamme: for which cause they conferred with Herod, and whetted his spleene and displeasure with varietie of slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kindle his jealousie against her. To these reproaches of theirs, he lent no unwilling eares; yet had he not the heart to attempt any thing against his wife, or to give free credit to their report; notwithstanding his displeasure increased and was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither she could colour her cares and discontents, nor he contain himself from exchanging his love into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some fatall doome against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra being dead, Cesar was become Lord of Egypt: for which cause halting forward to meet and entertaine him, he left his family in that present estate. Upon his departure, he recommended Mariamme to Sohemus, giving him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granted him in way of gratuitie a part of Jewry to governe.

E When Herod was arrived in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cesar, he was highly honoured by him: for Cesar gave him those foure hundred Frenchmen that were of Cleopatras guard; and restored that part of his countrey unto him again, which was taken away and spoyled by her. He annexed also unto his kingdome Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the Sea coasts the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppe, with the tower of Straton: which when he had obtained, he grew more mightie then before: and after he had accompanied Cesar as farre as Antioch, he returned into his own countrey. Upon his arrival, he found that fortune which was favourable unto him abroad, too froward at home; especially in regard of his wife, in whose affection beforetime he seemed to be most happy.

man.

For he was as inwardly touched with the lawfull love of Mariamme, as any other of whom the Histories make report: and as touching her, she was both chaste and faithfull unto him; yet had she a certaine womanly imperfection and naturall frowardnesse, which was the cause that she presumed too much upon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; so that without regard of his person, who had power and authoritie over others, she entertained him oftentimes very outrageously: All which he endured patiently, without any shew of discontent. But Mariamme upbraided and publickly approached both the Kings mother and sifter, telling them that they were but abjectly and basely borne.

Whereupon there grew a great enmity and unrecoverable hatred betweene the Ladies; and from thence also there arose an occasion of greater accusations and calumnyation then before. These suspicions were nourished amongst them, for the space of one whole yeer after Herods return from Cesar; and finally this long contrived and fore-imagined hatred at last brake out violently upon this occasion that ensueth: When as about mid-day the King had withdrawne himself into his chamber to take his rest, he called Mariamme unto him to sport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that he bare unto her. Upon this his command she came in unto him; yet would she not lie with him, nor entertaine his courtings with friendly acceptance, but upbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King took these reproachfull words in very evill part, and was almost ready to strike her: but his sifter hearing a greater stir and noise within then was usuall, sent in the Butler, who long before that time was suborned by her, whom shee commanded to tell the King, that Mariamme had prepared a drink for him to incite and quicken him unto love; willing him that if the King should be moved thereat, and should demand what he meant, he should certifie him, that Mariam having prepar'd a poyson for his grace, had dealt with him to deliver it to his Majestie. Charging him moreover, that if the King in hearing him speak of this potion, should seem to be moved therewith, that then he should proceed no further in his discourse. He therefore (being in this manner before-hand instructed what he ought to do) at that very instant was sent to discover his treachery unto the King; for which cause with a sober and stayed countenance he entred in unto him, being seriously and well prepared to discourse, and told him that Mariamme had bribed him to present his Majestie with an amorous cup of drink. Now when he perceived that the King was troubled with these words, he prosecuted his discourse, alleading that the potion was a certain medicine which Mariamme had given him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which he had received according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his own security, and the Kings safety.

Herod, who before this was highly displeased, hearing these words, was so much the more incensed: for which cause he presently commanded Mariammes most faithfull servant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poison, supposing that it was impossible for her to undertake anything whatsoever, without his privity. He being tried and tormented after this cruell manner, confessed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared unto the King, that the hatred which his wife had conceived against him, proceeded from certain words that Sohemus had told her. Scarcely had he finished these words, but that the King cryed out with a loud voice, saying, that Sohemus, who beforetime had beene most faithfull both to him and his kingdom, would not have declared these his privy commands, except there had been some more inward familiarity and secrecie betwixt him and Mariamme: for which cause he presently commanded his ministers to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her triall, and to this effect he assembled his most familiar friends, before whom he began to accuse her with great spight and spleen, as touching these potions and poysons aforesaid, wherein he used intemperate and unseemly speeches, and such as for their bitternesse did ill becom him in cause of justice; so that in the end, the assistants, seeing the butt and bent of his desire, pronounced sentence of death against her: which being past, both he, and all other the assistants were of this opinion, that shee should not so speedily be executed, but that shee should be kept close prisoner in some sure place of the Palace. But by Salomes sollicitations Herod was incited to hasten her death, for that she alleadged that the King ought to feare, lest some sedition should be raised amongst the people, if he should keep her alive in prison. And by this means Mariamme was led unto her death.

Alexandra her mother considering the estate of the time, and fearing no lesse mischief from Herods hands, then her daughter was assured of; she undecently changed her mind, and abjectedly laid aside her former courage and magnanimity. For intending to make it known, that she was neither party nor privy to those crimes, wherewith Mariamme was charged, she went out to meet her daughter, and entertained her injuriously, protesting pub-

likely that shee was a wicked woman, and ungratefull towards her husband; and that shee well deserved the punishment that was adjudged her, for that she durst be so bold to attempt so hainous a fact, neglecting to requite her husbands entire love, with her unfained loyalty. Whilest thus dishonestly shee counterfeited her displeasure, and was ready to pull Mari- amme by the haire, the assistants according to her desert, condemned her generally for her shamefull hypocrisie: but shee that was led to be punished, convicted her by her milde behaviour. For first of all, shee gave her no answer, neither was any wayes altered by her reproaches; neither would so much as cast her eye upon her; making it appeare, that shee discreetly concealed and covered her mothers imperfections, and was aggrieved that she had so openly shewed so great indignitie: expressing for her own part a constant behaviour, and going to her death without change of colour, so that those that beheld her, perceived in her a kinde of manifest courage and nobilitie, even in her utmost extremitie. Thus dyed Mari- amme, having been a woman that excelled both in continence and courage: notwithstanding that shee defaulted somewhat in affabilitie and impatience of nature: for the rest of her parts, she was of an admirable and pleasing beautie, and of such a carriage in those companies wherein she was intertained, that it was impossible to expresse the same, in that she surpassed all those of her time; which was the principall cause that she lived not graci- ously and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loved her, and from who she received nothing that might discontent her, she presumed upon a great and intemperate libertie in her discourse. Shee digested also the losse of her friends very hardly, according as in open tearmes she made it knowne unto the King: whereby also it came to passe, that both Herods mother, and sister, and himself likewise grew at oddes with her, and in especiall her Husband, from whom onely she expected no hard measure.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections; who before times, as we have declared, was already miserably distracted. For neither did he love after the common manner of married folke: but whereas almost even unto madnesse he nourished this his desire, he could not be induced by the too unbridled manners of his wife, to allay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doting on her, he increa- sed the same. And all that time especially he supposed that God was displeased with him, for the death of Mari- amme his wife. Oftentimes did he invocatte her name, and more often undecently lamented he her. And notwithstanding he devised all kinde of delights and sports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and inviting guests with princely hospitalitie, to passe away the time; yet all those profited him nothing. For which cause he gave over the charge and administration of his kingdome. And in such sort was he over- whelmed with griefe, that oftentimes he commanded his ministers to call his wife Mari- amme, as if as yet she had been alive. Whilest thus he was affected, there befell a pesti- lence within the Citie, that consumed a great sort of the people, and the better part of the nobilitie, and each man interpreted that this punishment was inflicted by God upon men, for the unjust death of the Queene. Thus the Kings discontents being by this meanes increased, he at last hid himselfe in a solitary wilderness, under pretext of hunting, where afflicting himselfe incessantly, at last he fell into a most grievous sicknesse. This disease of his was an inflammation or paine in the necke: he seemed also in some sort to rave and waxe mad; neither could any remedies relieve him of his agonie; but when as the sicknesse seemed rather to increase, all men at last grew almost desperate of his re- covery. For which cause his Physician, partly in respect of the contumacie of his disease, partly, because in so great a danger there was not any free election of dyet, they gave him leave to taste whatsoever best pleased his appetite, committing the uncertaine event of his health to the hands of fortune.

Whilest thus he sojourned in Samaria, which now is called Sebaste, Alexandra inhabiting as that time in Jerusalem, having notice of this his estate, sought to reduce all the strong fortresses that were within the Citie, under her subjection: the one of which abutted upon the Temple; the other was situate within the Citie: for they that are Lords of these, keep all the rest of the nation under their awe, because that without these, neither the usuall and daily sacrifices may be performed, neither may the Jews live without such sacrifices and ob- lations, who had rather lose their lives then contemne their religion. Shee therefore la- boured those that had the government thereof, to surrender them up to her and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mari- amme, for feare lest he being dead, they should be seized by others: And if it should fortune him to recover his health, in the meane while they might be kept and held by no man more securely, then such as were his domesticall friends. This suite and sollicitation of hers was but coldly conceited of: and the Captains who at other times shewed themselves alwaies faithfull, at that time were the rather far more constant in their dutie, both for that they hared Alexandra, as also for that they thought it a great offence to despaire of the health of their Prince. For these were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods own nephew, whose name was Achiabus. For which cause they sent present messengers unto him to certifie him of Alexandras intent: who having heard these newes, presently commanded her to be slaine: and at length overcoming his sickness, he grew so badly affected both in body and minde, that he waxed hatefull unto all men; so that all those who offended him for how little cause soever, were readily sought for to be punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of divers of his inward friends, as Costabarus, Lyfimachus, Antipater surnamed Gadias, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensueth. Costabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greatest account amongst his countrey-men, who was descended from the Priests of Cozas, whom the Idumæans esteeme for a god. Now after that Hircanus had drawne the policy of the Idumæans to the reformed customes of the Jews, Herod was made King of the Jews, and appointed Costabarus to be Governour in Idumæa and Gaza, giving him Salome his sister to wife, after he had put Ioseph to death, to whom she had been married beforetime, as we have heretofore declared. Costabarus seeing himself in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more elate and proud then his good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himself so farre, that he thought himself dishonoured, if he should performe that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumæans should be under the Jews subjection, notwithstanding they had received their manner of government from them. He therefore sent messengers unto Cleopatra, giving her to understand, that Idumæa had alwaies been under her ancestors subjection; and for that cause shee ought upon just cause to demand and begge that countrey at Antimus hands, and that in respect of himselfe he was ready to become her servant. All which he practised, not to gratifie Cleopatra in any sort whatsoever, but to the intent, that if Herods fortunes should be any waies weakned, he might more easily by this meanes both enlarge and obtaine the kingdome of Idumæa. And with these foolish hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together by such dishonest meanes as he continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatra often and earnest petition to obtaine this soveraigntie; yet could she not obtaine it at Antimus hands. When Herod had notice of these covert and cunning practices, he was ready to kill Costabarus. But upon the earnest supplications of his sister and her mother, he dismissed and pardoned him; yet held him alwaies in suspicion, by reason of this his practice. Not long after it hapned, that Salome fell at debate with Costabarus, for which cause she sent a libell of divorce to her husband, notwithstanding it were against the lawes and ordinary customes of the Jews. For according to our ordinances, it is onely lawfull for the husband to doe the same; and as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet it is not lawfull for her to marry again, except her husband first give her licence. But Salome without respect of the lawes of the countrey, grounding her selfe too much upon her own authoritie, forsooke her husband, saying, that she separated herself from her husband, by reason of the great friendship which she bare unto her brother, for that she had received some notice that Costabarus practised some innocation with Antipater, Lyfimachus and Dositheus. And this accusation of hers confirmed she by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all securitie for the space of twelve yeeres. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod; as soone as he heard it. For as touching Babas sonnes, he had heretofore resolved to cut them off, for that they had been alwaies badly affected towards him and all his enterprizes; but all that time he had let them passe; because by continuance they were growne out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmitie and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground: At such time as Antigonus enjoyed the soveraigntie, and Herod besieged the Citie of Jerusalem with an armie: now those incommodities and necessities that ordinarily happen unto those that are besieged, were the cause that divers acknowledged Herod, and fixed their hopes upon him. But Babas sonnes being in authoritie, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, persevered in their faithfull observation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the kingdome in those to whom it appertained by descent: and they themselves followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the Common-weale. But after that the Citie was surprized by Herod, and he grew master of the estate, Costabarus, who was appointed to keep the Citie gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to have forsaken the Kings side, should escape, knowing that the sonnes of Babas were greatly esteemed and honoured among the people,

A people, and foreseeing that their safetie might be no small furtherance to himselfe, if at any time there might befortune any alteration; he discharged, and hid them within his owne possessions: and notwithstanding that at that time he had protested to Herod by an oath, that he knew not what was become of them; yet though suspected of perjury, he concealed them. And afterwards when the King had by Proclamation promised a reward to him that should discover them, and sought for them by all meanes, neither then also would he confesse the fact. For being affraid lest he should be punished for his first deniall; he continued through concealment, being not onely now driven thereunto by friendship, but also by necessitie.

Now when the King had notice hereof by his sisters report, he sent certaine messengers to the place where they were hidden, and slew them, and all those that were partakers of the same crime: so that no one of Hircanus kindred was now left alive; but all of them being slain, who excelled in nobilitie and dignitie, he did what himselfe listed without any contradiction or controulement: for which cause he by little and little forsooke the ceremonies and ordinances of his countrey, and corrupted the decrees and institutions of their ancestors, which he ought to have kept inviolable, by his new and strange inventions. In whose time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of living; for all fell from bad to worse: and the politike order, whereby the people ought to be governed and kept within compasse of their dutie, went to decay. For first of all, he ordained certaine wrestlings from five yeeres to five yeeres, in honour of Cæsar; and builded a Theater for that purpose within Jerusalem. He erected also a most huge Amphitheater within the Plaine, which were two piles worthy the regard and beholding, by reason of the sumptuousnesse thereof; but wholly estranged from the fashions of the Jews. For neither the use, nor the presentation of these spectacles, hath ever been practised or taught by our ancestors: yet was it his pleasure to ennoble this assembly, to the end it might be continued from five to five yeeres, and this proclaimed he publicly in the countries round about him, and to this spectacle assembled he all the Nations. The wrastlers also, and all that which concerned their exercise, were sought out from all corners of the world, under the hope to obtaine the proposed palme and victorie; and all the most excellent in those exercises that were to be found, were invited to that assembly. For he proposed most huge rewards, not onely to those that exercised wrastling, but also unto those who are called Musicians, and to all sorts of players on instruments, labouring to his utmost power, that all the most famous in those professions should be assistant in those pastimes. He appointed also a reward of great value for such as ran upon chariots of three, foure or of one horse; and all that which was both sumptuous and magnificent to behold, for every one was most carefully provided, in that he strove to have the honour of a most magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Cæsars titles, and the trophees of those nations, which were overcome by him, altogether set out and shining with gold and silver. As for the instruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, costly vestments, or precious stones. Thither also were drawne certaine savage beasts, as Lions and other wilde beasts, which were worthy to be placed in this famous shew, being admirable both for their force and rarenesse of nature, who fought the one with the other, and against such men likewise who were condemned to die: whereby the strangers conceived, together with the admiration of his expence, an uncomparable and unaccustomed pleasure. But his countrey men interpreted this thing for a manifest corruption of those disciplines and manners which beforetime they had entertained, and honoured amongst them. For it was an act most manifestly impious, to hazard men against wilde beasts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was also a matter as impious, to change and prophane the ordinances of the countrey, for forraine exercises: But the most hated of all these, were the Trophees: for in that they were certain images attired in armour, the use and veneration whereof were forbidden by our lawes, this displeased and grieved them more then any thing whatsoever: neither was Herod ignorant of those troubles, which they procured. But he thought it to be a matter of danger to attempt the same for the present by force; and for that cause he familiarly debated the same with some few of them, and discoursed unto them his occasions, to the end to rid them of their superstition, although herein he profited nothing. For all of them with one consent, cried out against the indignitie which they saw him commit: telling him, that although all other things were to be tolerated, yet the Trophees, which were images of men, were unsupportable, because they were unuall in their countrey. Herod perceiving that they were discontented, and that they would not easily be wrought upon, except they had some contentment, he called the most worthiest men amongst them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them what they thought these Trophees were: and when they cried out that they were images of men: he incontinently caused all the ornaments to be taken off from them, letting them see that they were nought else but naked stocks of wood; so that suddenly their displeasure was turned into a laughter, and their doubts were pleasantly discussed. Thus appeased he the people, and moderated the fury of their dislikes: so that divers of them changed their opinions, and were no more displeased. Notwithstanding, there were some of these that persisted in the indignitie they conceived in those accustomed exercises, supposing that the corruption of their ancient discipline was an inducement to their grievous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to undertake all dangers, then to endure any alteration in their policy, by permitting that Herod should introduce new and extraordinary fashions, who onely in word was their King, but in effect an enemy of their whole nation. For this cause there were ten men amongst them, who bound themselves by oath to hazard all extremities, and to this intent they hid certaine short swords under their garments: amongst these there was one that was blind, who urged and egged on by the strangeness of those things which he had heard, not for that he was of abilitie to execute any thing with his hand, but to testifie that he was ready to suffer with the rest, if any misfortune should befall them, by his example the rest of them were not a little confirmed. These having mutually undertaken this their resolution, repaired to the Theater under hope that Herod should not escape them, for that they intended to assaile him unawares: at leastwise if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foule on some of his favourites and followers, accounting this to be some solace in their expected death, if in regard of their violated religion, they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. And these intending to offer themselves as Chiefetaines and Leaders unto the rest, resolved to execute these things. But one of those intelligencers that Herod had sent abroad to pry and search into such like actions, having discovered all this their conspiracy, signified the same unto the King, at such time as he was ready to enter into the Theater. He knowing full well what hatred was continually hatched against him, betooke himself to his palace, and sent for the conspirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there was no way for them to escape, resolved to endure their present misfortunes with a valiant courage: for being no waies dismaide, with a constant countenance they drew out their weapons, protesting that their conspiracy was honest and holy, not attempted by them for private affection, or their own profit sake, but in the behalf of their publike discipline, which no good man would either see or suffer to be violated, no though it cost him his life.

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged these things for their justification, they were led away by the Kings ministers to be slaughtered by divers sorts of torments. Not long after this, that intelligencer who had betrayed them, growing hatefull in all mens eyes, was slain by certain men, and chopt in pieces with their swords, and afterwards cast unto the dogs in sight and presence of many men. Yet did no man discover this act, untill after long and wearisome inquisitions made by Herod, it was wrought out of certain poore women (who were privy to the fact) with divers torments. Then were all the actors of that murder punished, with their whole families: and notwithstanding all this, the common people was in no sort dismaide, but were ready to defend their lawes, except they were restrained by some greater power. Which when the King perceived, he resisted their indeavours with all diligence, lest haply through these alterations in affaires, the people should be drawne to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two strong castles within the Citie, one wherein his palace was, another called Antonia, that adjoynd neere unto the Temple, fortified by him; he thought good to strengthen a third called Samaria, the name whereof he changed, and called it Sebaste (which was distant from Jerusalem some daies journey) to contain those of the common sort that were abroad, under his obedience, and very fit to bridle any uproares that might be raised in the citie and fields. And for the whole nation he builded a fort, which in times past was called Straton, and afterwards he named it Cæsarea. He builded also a fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala, in a large Plaine, where by course he kept his horsemen. Besides these, he builded the fort of Esthmonites in the countrey of Perza on the other side Jordan.

Now when he had fitly disposed all these Castles through his whole countrey, for the securitie and safetie of his kingdome, the matter of rebellion was taken from the common people, who upon every light cause are subject to commotions, in that he had prepared a remedy against all privy conspiracies, by planting such forces alwaies neere at hand, who might prevent and pacifie all alterations upon their originall. After this, betaking himself to encompass Samaria with a wall, he brought to passe that divers of those, who had borne armes

A with him against his enemies, and divers of the people likewise that dwelt round about, came to inhabite it, both in regard of the Temple, which he intended to build in that place, as also for that he fortified the same for his own securitie (although that beforetime it was not in the number of famous Cities.) He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebaste, and distributed the lands that confined the City among the inhabitants of the same (which was by nature a fruitfull and goodly countrey) to the intent that within a little space they might enrich themselves. He invironed the City also with a strong wall, being assisted by the naturall strength and steepnesse of the place: and besides the whole circuit, he included so much ground, that it was no wayes inferiour to any of the famous Cities; for it contained the circuit of twenty furlongs or stadia. And in the midst thereof there was a sacred place, containing a furlong and a halfe, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a Temple builded, famous both for beauty and bignesse. And as for the other parts of the City, he decked them with all sorts of ornaments. And seeing how neerely it concerned him to provide for the security of his person in this walled City, he erected a Fortresse for himselfe. And as touching the beauty thereof, his intent was that it should remaine for a monument to posterity, of his magnificence and liberality.

CHAP. XII.

C In that very yeere, which was the thirteenth yeere of Herods reigne, very great calamities hapned in that countrey (either through Gods displeasure, or for that the revolution of time would have it so.) For first of all, there were such continuall droughts, that by reason thereof the earth grew barren, and produced not those fruits, which of it selfe it was accustomed to beare. And after this, the ordinary course of mens diets being altered by reason of the want of corne, the want of sustenance was accompanied with a bodily sicknesse (for that by custome these two plagues doe ordinarily entertaine one another:) For this made the plague and sicknesse more vehement, for that the sicke in this great penury, could neither have care of themselves as was expedient, nor get convenient nourishment for preservation of life: And many died daily, and those also that remained alive were in despaire, because they could not relieve their want and necessities, what diligence soever they used. For which cause, after the old fruits of that yeere were wholly consumed, and all the rest of their store was utterly spent, there appeared not any meanes whereupon they might hope, namely, for that the misery increased more then was expected; yea and extended it selfe beyond that yeere: so that they had nothing remaining by them, and the seeds they sowed at that time mouldred away, and the earth for all their labours afforded them no interest. The necessity therefore being thus great, constrained men to search out many new inventions to maintain their life: and the King likewise was in no lesse perplexity, in that he was deprived of those ordinary revenues which he received by the fruits of the earth, and the rather, for that he had spent his money in repairing his cities, according as before this we have declared: and in such sort were all things wasted by divers calamities, that a man could conceive no hope of remedy. Besides this, the people grew in hatred of their King, for that it is their custome ordinarily to accuse their Governors, as if they were the authors of all their evils. Yet did the King bethinke himselfe how he might remedy these inconveniences, but hardly could he find the means, for that their neighbours had no means to sell them victuals, because they were no lesse afflicted then themselves: and although he might have recovered some little means for a great sum of money, yet wanted he it also to defray the charges: notwithstanding in that he knew, that it behooved him to imploy his uttermost indeavours in yeelding a generall remedy to such & so violent an oppression, he melted down all those moveables he had either of gold or silver within his Palace, & spared nothing either for the matter, the excellency, or the fashion; no not so much as the vessels wherein he was ordinarily served. This money sent he into Egypt, where at that time under Cesar, Petronius held the government. This man being Herods friend, in that he desired the safety of his subjects, at such time as divers of them retired themselves unto him, by reason of that their necessity, he permitted them to buy up corne, and assisted them in all things, both in their bargaines, and in their carriages, so that the greater or the whole sum of their succours was attributed to him. But after their returne, Herod wrought so much, that the care that was taken by him, did not only change the affections of those, which beforetime were his enemies, but besides all this, he purchased great praise and commendation for his liberality and singular providence. For first of all he distributed a certaine quantitie of come to all those, who were notable of themselves to supply their owne wants, using herein both great care and diligence. After this, for that there were a great number of such, who in regard of their age, or some other infirmities, were unable to prepare their victuals, he tooke order for their reliefe, and appointed them certaine Bakers, who should furnish them with bread, both sufficient and meet for their sustenance. He gave order also, that they should not passe the winter disfurnished of cloathing, but provided for such as were naked sufficient raiment, considering that the sheepe were partly dead, and partly devoured, and that there was no wooll to set them a work, or other stuffe to make garments of. Now after he had furnished his subjects with these things, he thought good also to shew kindnesse to the neighbouring cities, and stored the Syrians with seed-corne to sowe their lands, which yeelded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gave him a large and plentiful tribute for that she had received; so that all of them had abundance of victuals: and as soone as the harvest was ready, he sent fiftie thousand men into that countrey which he had relieved: and by this meanes he with all diligence restored his afflicted Kingdome, and comforted his neighbours, who were oppressed with the like calamities. For there was not any man in necessitie, that according to his qualitie was not assisted and succoured.

The villages likewise and the cities, and those of the common sort who entertained great households, and were in want, having their recourse unto him, received that which they had need of; so that to reckon up all the corne which he gave unto those, who were not his subjects, it appeareth that he employed ten thousand Cores of wheat: now the Core containeth ten Athenian bushels: and within the compasse of his Realme he employed eightie thousand: which care of his, and discreetly employed favour, wrought so much in the hearts of the Jews, and was so highly renowned amongst other nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceived against him, for that he had altered certain customes of their Kingdome, was wholly forgotten, and he was supposed by them to have made a sufficient recompence, by the diligence he had shewed in assisting them in their necessities, and no lesse either grace or glory obtained he among strangers: so that by these miseries the Kings honour was not a little magnified, and whatsoever damage he received at home, so much honour and reputation atchieved he abroad. For whereas in strangers necessities he had shewed himselfe so full of magnanimities, each man did not respect what he had been before, but such as they lately found him to be.

Herod sendeth Cesar five hundred of his guard. The Palace built in Jerusalem. Herod & Rufinus, chap. 12.

About the same time also he sent Cesar certaine supplies, namely, five hundred chosen men of his guard, whom Elis Gallus led into the wars in Arabia, and had often use of them in his most dangerous attempts. When as therefore his Kingdome was restored to his former felicitie, he builded a royall palace in the higher part of the citie, furnished with many large buildings, and decked with gold and marble seats; so as they might receive a great number of men: he named also each room of the house according to their severall names, and called one the lodging of Cesar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with love, he married a wife, lest he should be distracted by vain desires, and the cause of this his new marriage was this: There was amongst those that dwelt in Jerusalem, a certaine citizen called Simon, the sonne of Bathai the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefest in nobilitie amongst them: this man had a daughter, the fairest and comliest creature of that age, whose beauty renowned by the common voice, it came to passe, that with her faire Herod at one time entertained a good affection towards her, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, he grew in love with her; yet would not use his authorities, lest he should seeme to have himselfe tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his betrothed wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed unworthy his affinitie, and yet too worthy to be blasted by contempt, he made election of a convenient meanes to obtaine the fulnesse of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause he presently deposed the high Priest Iesus the sonne of Phabes, and established Simon in his place, and that done, he contracted affinitie with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded a new castle in that place wherein he had overcome the Jews, upon the time and incontinently after the overthrow of Antigonus, and when he had taken upon him the government.

Herod removeth Iesus from his priesthood, and placeth Simon in his roome, and marrieth his daughter.

This place is distant from Jerusalem some sixty furlongs or stades, strong by nature, and fit for defence and good fortification. For neer unto the same there is a certain steep hill made by Art, after the manner of a round dudge, environed with round towers, with a steep ascent of two hundred steps cut out of hewed stone. Within the same there are divers places, builded with great and sumptuous workmanship, made both for defence and delight. At the foot of this hill there are two houses worthy the sight, for divers their singularities, and namely, by reason of those conduits of water, which although they spring not in that place,

A place, yet notwithstanding are they brought from farre with great cost and expence. The Plaine that adjoyneth upon it, is all full of buildings after the manner of a Citie, and the top of the Castle commandeth all the Plaine. As soone as therefore he had disposed all his affaires, according to his hearts desire, he possessed the kingdome in great quietnesse, for that he made his subjects obedient unto him, both by feare, in shewing himself inexorable when it concerned him to punish; and by liberalitie, whereby he provided for their publike necessities: he therefore took an especiall care of himself, as if the life and safetie of his person had been the securitie of his people. He behaved himself officiously and favourably towards all forraign cities: he entertained the Princes by presents, which according to his occasions he sent unto them, to insinuate himselfe into their favours, being in his owne nature magnificent and fit to govern: so that all his fortunes increased, and all things fell out happily according to his hearts desire. True it is, that the care which he imployed in honouring Caesar, and other mightie Magistrates of Rome, caused him to outstrip his customes, and to falsifie divers ordinances of his countrey, in building Cities, and erecting Temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the land of Jury: for the Jews would not have endured it, because we are forbidden to honour images and figures, formed according to the likenesse of a man, as the Greeks are accustomed to doe, but he did this in the countrey and forraign cities, and excused himself to the Jews, saying, that he did it not of his own head, but performed that according to the charge and commandment which he had from others, who were greater then himself: and in the meane-while gratified Caesar and the Romans, in that he respected their honor more then he did the ordinances of his countrey; although in all things he had respect to his particular advantage, and determined with himself to leave behind him after his death, large and ample testimonies of his power and greatness: which was the cause that he builded cities with great charge and expence.

CHAP. XIII.

WHEN as therefore he had found out a fit and convenient place upon the Sea coast, to build a citie on, which of long time had been called the tower of Straton, he both magnificently designed and set down the module and forme thereof, and made many sumptuous buildings, both of royall places, and of other private lodgings, not builded after a slight manner, or of weake and fading matter, but of marble stone. But the greatest and busiest worke of all, was the haven which he made exempt and free from stormes and tempests, that in greatnesse resembled that of Piræus, and was so spacious, that it was able to receive many great ships into the road, and had divers roomes and ware-houses to lay up the merchandize therein. And the more admirable was this pile, because the stufte that was fit to finish this so great worke, was not gathered or gotten in that place, but must needs be brought from another place, upon great charge and expence. This citie is seated in Phoenicia upon the coast, in the way to Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, certain villages situate upon the Sea coasts, unfit either for landing or harbour, by reason of the Affricke wind, that driving the sand of the Sea upon the shore, giveth not any quiet road unto the ships, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at anchor. To correct this incommoditie of the place, he made the circuit round about the port so spacious, that it was able to receive a great Fleet: and he cast down to the bottome thereof, which was about some twentie fathoms deep, certain huge stones, that for the most part were fiftie foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, some more and some lesse. The pile that was erected upon this to affront the Sea, was a pane of two hundred foot, the halfe whereof was opposed against the waves to break the fury of the streame, and for this cause was called in the Greeke tongue Protymasion, that is to say, Before flood: The other halfe served as a foundation to beare up a wall of stone fortified with divers towers, the chiefeft whereof was a faire pile or building, which was called Drusus, in memory of Drusus, Caesars sonne in law, who died very young: it had also divers retreats or hostries in the same, into which the Mariners were received and lodged. The descent being hard by, encompassed all the port like a round platform, that served for a pleasant walking place for whomsoever listed. The entrance & mouth of the haven was toward the north, which is a wind that of all other most purifieth and cleanseth. The supporter and strength of all the circuit on the left hand upon the entrance to the port, was an ample and huge tower to fasten it the more strongly; and on the right hand, were two huge pillars of stone, more higher then the Tower that stood opposite against them, erected and fastned together.

together. All round about the haven there were certaine buildings, abutting one upon another of polished marble, and in the midst there was a little hillocke, on which there was a certaine monument placed in honour of Cæsar, which presented it self to their sight who failed to the port, in which there were the figures of the Citie of Rome and of Cæsar. This Citie also was called Cæsarea, as much to be wondered at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the Art whereby it was erected: and no lesse cunning was there shewed in the vaults and conduits under ground, then in those buildings that were about them; some of them were conveyed toward the port, and discharged themselves into the Sea by certaine compassed spaces: but there was one that went athwart, that comprehended all the rest, to the end that thereby the raine-water, and the cleansings of the Citie might be conveyed into the Sea, and that when the Sea should flow, it might wash and cleanse all the Citie.

He erected also a Theater of stone, and behind the same to the Southward, an Amphitheater, that was able to receive a great number of men; and so pleasantly and fitly situated, that from the same a man might discover the Sea. This Citie was finished at the end of twelve years, during which time, the King was neither wearied by intending the work, nor negligent in furnishing the necessary charges. After this, perceiving that the Citie of Sebasta was already inhabited also, he resolved to send his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome, to present them unto the Emperour Cæsar; who no sooner resorted thither, but they were lodged in Pollus house, who amongst all the rest was an intire friend of Herod. They might have lien also at Cæsars house, who entertained them with as great familiaritie and kindnesse, as might be possible: and gave Herod licence in like manner to confirme the kingdome in one of his children, which so ever best liked him, annexing to his government, the countries of Trachona, Baranea, and Auranita for the occasion which ensueth. A certaine man called Zenodorus, had hired Lysanius demaines or Lordship: and not contenting himself with those revenewes which he gathered, but desirous to gather more, he lived upon spoiles and robberies in Trachona, which is a countrey, the inhabitants whereof commonly live by pillage and spoile, which they purchase from the Citizens and Merchants of Damasco. And so farre was Zenodorus from prohibiting these robberies, that he himself also was partaker of the bootie; so that the nations neighbouring round about, seeing themselves thus abused, sought for remedy at Varnus hands, who was their Governour, requiring him to certifie Cæsar, of Zenodorus wrongs and outrages. Which when he understood, he commanded that such lawlesse ryoters should be punished, and that the countrey should be added unto the jurisdiction of Herod, to the intent, that by his vigilancy the inhabitants of Trachona should no more molest their neighbours. For it was hard to restrain them, considering that they were accustomed and traded in such theft, and could not live otherwaies. For they neither had townes nor lands, neither heritages nor any possessions, but onely certaine retreats and caves under ground, and lived pell mell like beasts: and having made abundant provision of water and victuals, they might easily endure warre a long time, and maintaine themselves in their caves, when their enemies assailed them without.

The doores of these dens were so narrow, that they could be entred but by one at once; but within it was incredible spacious and large: the upper part thereof was not steepe, but plaine, and in forme of a smooth earth: for the whole place naturally consisteth of a sharpe and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult passage thereon, unlesse a man be guided thorow the paths. For the way was not direct and straight, but full of windles and many turnings. At such time as they wanted opportunitee to spoile their neighbours, they robbed one another; and omitted no kinde of wickednesse. Herod having received the gift of this countrey at Cæsars hands, resorted thither under the conduct of certaine guides that knew the waies, and having brought their power and prolling to an end, he left the neighbour nations in assured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with envy, partly incited by the grief which he conceived through the losse of his possessions, resorted to Rome to accuse Herod; yet could effect nothing of that which he intended.

When Agrippa was sent into Asia by Cæsar to governe the provinces beyond the Seas, Herod, because he was his very friend and familiar, went to salute him at Mitylene where he wintered, for that he was one of his inward friends, and afterwards returned into Jewry. But certaine Gadareans came unto Agrippa with an intent to accuse Herod: but he sent them bound unto the King, and vouchsafed them no audience. On the other side, the Auranites, who of long time hated Herods government, stirred up commotions, & laboured to draw the countrey into rebellion, and that upon a just ground, as it seemed, at that time: for Zenodorus despairing of his affaires, went and sold them a certaine part of the Lordship in Auranita (which was comprehended within Cæsars donation to Herod) for the summe of fiftie talents of yearly revenue, wherewith they grew discontented, for that they were unjustly deprived of their estates: and hereupon they made often incursions, endeavouring themselves sometimes to recover the same by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their possession by course of justice. They drew also unto them certaine needy souldiers; who according to the custom of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innovation: which though Herod knew, and could have providently prevented them, yet exhorted he them to maintaine their titles rather by good meanes then open violence, being loth to give any occasion of new trouble or disquiet. At length in the seventeenth yeere of his reigne, Cesar came into Syria: upon whose arrivall divers of the Gadareans began to exclaim against Herod, accusing him of his severity and tyranny: which accusation they the rather attempted, because they were chiefly incited thereunto by the instigations and false suggestions of Zenodorus, who bound himself by an oath, that he would never give over, untill that delivering them from Herods tyranny, they were reduced under Casars protection. The Gadareans, perswaded by these his protestations, began to continue their exclamations; and that somewhat the more audaciously, for that they perceived that they lived as yet unpunished whom Agrippa had delivered into Herods hands: for Herod had set them at liberty without any punishment, notwithstanding that in regard of his owne subjects he was inexorable, as ever man was; and most patient in induring those injuries that were offered him by strangers, whom hee alwaies dismissed without revenge. When as therefore they accused him of violence and rapine, and for violating and razing down their Temples, Herod being nothing dismayed thereat, presented himself before the Emperour to justifie his actions. But Cesar entertained him very kindly, and diminished nothing of the good affection which he bare unto him, notwithstanding all the uproares and insolent tumults of the people. Thus was the first day spent in audience of their complaints, and in those daies that followed there were no further objections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiving both Casars disposition and the inclination of his counsell, and fearing (as it was most likely) to be delivered into Herods hands, the next night after some of them slew themselves; other some for feare of torments brake their owne necks; and some of them also drowned themselves in the river. And thus whereas they seemed to fore-judge themselves, Cesar presently absolved Herod.

And this felicity of his, was seconded with another of small consequence. For Zenodorus having his bowels broken through an extreame fluxe of blood, finished his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Cesar gave Herod his countrey, which was a large and ample signory, and was situate between Trachonita and Galilee, containing Vlatha, Paneas, and the countries thereabouts. He made him one of the Governours of Syria also, commanding them to execute nothing without his advice. At this time attained he to the height of all worldly felicitie: For whereas within the huge and ample Romane Empire, all things were disposed by Cesar, and Agrippa, Cesar honoured no man more then Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa respected him above all men next to Cesar. Whereupon he grew to be so confident, that he begged a Tetrarchy at Casars hands, for his brother Pheroras: on whom he bestowed one hundred talents of his revenue out of his own kingdome, to the intent that if he should happen to die, Pheroras estate might be assured and left no waies subject unto his children.

As soone as therefore he had conducted Cesar as farre as the Sea, upon his return he builded a goodly Temple of white marble in honour of his name, in the countrey which belonged to Zenodorus, neer to a place which is called Panion, which is a goodly cave in the heart of a mountain, and a place of great pleasure, under which there is a wide poole of immeasurable depth, which is full of standing water, and the upper part of the mountain is very high. From under this cave spring the fountain heads of the floud Jordan. This place of it selfe so famous and delightfull, was chosen out by Herod, and adorned also with a Temple which he built in honor of Cesar. At that time also he released the third part of those tributes which his subjects paid unto him, to the end (as he said) that he might relieve his subjects after the penury they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their favours, who were sinisterly affected towards him. For they had conceived an hatred against him, because all pietie was in a manner abolished, and the ordinances of the countrey in a sort disannulled by the meanes of those temples, which he had built, and each man privily muttered with bitterness against him, so that welny they were addressed to mutiny. But Herod with great discretion prevented the same, and cut off all occasions of insurrection, commanding every one to intend his labour, forbidding them to make any assemblies in the citie, or to talk one with another under colour of walking abroad for pleasure or feasts sake. Moreover, he had sent out certaine Intelligencers to discover all that which was done, appointing grievous punishments for those that misliked, or maligned his government. For divers of them were led unto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some privately, where they were no sooner imprisoned, but they were put to death; and both in the citie and in the countrey, there were certaine men appointed to take note of all such that used any assemblies upon any occasion whatsoever. And so inwardly was he tormented with their dislikes, that as it is reported of him, he took upon him the habit of a private man, and thrust himself in the night time into the company of the people, to understand and gather what they thought of his government, and those whom he found to be untractable and obdurate, and would not be conformed to his will, he dispatched them by one meanes or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serve him faithfully, and constrained them to keepe the oath they had sworn, and to acknowledge his soveraigntie: whereunto divers through the feare they conceived, easily condescended. But they who had a more greater courage, and were discontented to see themselves constrained, he cut them short by all the meanes that he might. He required also an oath of divers of those sectaries, who followed the Pharisees Pollio and Sameas: and notwithstanding they demed to take the oath, yet he did not punish them as he did the other for their refusal, in respect and reverence of Pollio their master. From this rigour also were they exempt, who amongst us are called Essians, which is a sort of men that live after that manner that Pythagoras did among the Grazians, of whom I have more expressly discoursed in another place.

At this present I thinke it not a matter to be overslipt, neither estranged from the aime of my history, to report for what cause the King had so religious an opinion of those men. There was a certaine Essian called Manahem, who in his sect was accounted an upright and just man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He seeing Herod one day at such time as he was very young and went to schoole, saluted him and called him King of the Jewes. Herod supposing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reproved him sharply for that his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himself to be one of the common sort. Manahem smiling, hit him gently with his hand upon the back, and said unto him, Thou shalt be King, and shalt have a happy reign. For such is Gods pleasure, and at that time remember thy self of the words that Manahem spake unto thee, which shall serve for a testimony to put thee in minde of thy mutable estate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, then by justice, pietie, and equitie, to wipne the hearts of thy subjects: yet know I by revelation from God, that thou wilt not follow these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both divine and humane laws: though in other respects thou shalt be most fortunate and purchase eternall glory. Yet shalt thou not escape Gods hands: for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life, with a grievous punishment.

At that time Herod gave small regard to those his words, in that he had no hope that any such thing should happen: but not long after, as soone as he had obtained the kingdome to the fulnesse of his felicitie, he in the greatnesse of his power sent for Manahem, and asked him how long he should reign. But he returned him a doubtfull answer. Which when Herod perceived, he asked him anew if he should reign ten yeers. Whereunto Manahem answered, and twentie, and thirtie, without setting him down any prefixed terme. Herod contenting himself herewith, embraced Manahem, and gave him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Essians for his sake. I have thought good to register these things, notwithstanding they may seeme incredible, to declare that divers of our nation have had communication with God by reason of their holinesse.

CHAP. XIII.

HEROD buildeth a new Temple in Ierusalem, after he had pulled down the old.

IN the eighteenth yeer of his reign, Herod, after he had finished these many and admirable actions, conceited in his minde no mean, but a mighty project, which was to reedifie Gods Temple of greater bignesse and answerable height, hoping that this work which was the most admirable of all those he had undertaken (as indeed it was) in being finished, would eternize his memorie. But fearing lest the people, in regard of the greatnesse of the enterprise, would be hardly drawn thereunto, he determined to sound their intents by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this maner:

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vain and superfluous, to recount unto you what things I have performed, during the time of my government. For they have been of that

A that nature, that they have returned me but little honour; and your self great profit and security. For you your selves know, that in those adversities that have befallen you, I have been no wayes negligent in that which concerned your profit; and in those buildings I have erected by Gods assistance, I have not so much regarded my self, as that which concerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God, that I have brought the estate of the Jews to that degree of felicitie, that they never had or expected before this time. As for that which I have particularly exploited in the heart of the countrey, and in the cities which I have augmented, as well with ornament and beauty, as with a number of inhabitants, since you your selves know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your memory. But I must at this time assure you that the designe which I will presently enterprize, is farre more holy and more excellent, then may be performed by us. For our predecessors, after they were returned from the captivitie of Babylon, builded a temple in honour of our great and mighty God, which in height wanted fixty cubits of that which Solomon first built: yet ought we not to object as a blame, or ascribe this action to any impietie in our ancestors. For the Temple was not at their disposition, but the measure of their building was set them down by Cyrus and Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, to whom and their successors they have first of all been slaves, as after their time they have been under the subjection of the Macedonians: so that they had not the means and opportunitie to raise this religious monument, according to his first pattern, to that requisite and convenient height. But since at this present by Gods permission, I have obtained the kingdome; and that for a long time hitherto we have enjoyed a happy peace; and that neither money nor great revenues are wanting; and that which is our greatest good, we are made happy by the favour of the Romans, who in a sort are the Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire friends: I will enforce my self to repair that defect, which hapned in times past through the miseries, and weak means of our noble predecessors, resolving with my self to perfect that which is requisite for the service of God, in acknowledgement of the benefits which I have received from him, by whose mercy and means I have obtained my kingdome.

This sudden and unexpected speech of Herods, filled all mens ears with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he seemed to promise such a thing, as was beyond their hope, and as they thought farre greater then his power: and that which most distracted them was, for that they had conceived a fear, lest after he had pulled down the old, he should not be of ability to erect a new. For which cause his counsell seemed to be dangerous, and attempt over difficult. But the King perceiving with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promising in no sort to deface the old Temple, before all that was prepared and polished which was requisite for the building of the new. And in this he kept his word. For he appointed a thousand chariots to draw stones unto the place, and chose out amongst the rest ten thousand cunning and expert workmen. He apparelled also at his own charge one thousand Priests in their accustomed vestments, whereof some gave the masons instructions how they should work, and the rest assisted the carpenters. This done, after he had fitly and readily performed and prepared all things requisite, he caused them to fall to their building. As soon as therefore the former foundations were taken away, and other meer new were planted in their place, the Temple was erected upon them, in length one hundred cubits, and twenty cubits in height, above those hundred cubits which the former contained, which twenty cubits were in some sort scantled, after that by succession of time the foundations began to be settled, and during Nerors reign our countrymen had thought to have raised it to the first height. The building was of white and strong marble stones, which were each of them twenty and five cubits long, eight cubits high, and about some twelve cubits broad. All the structure of the same was made after the maner of a princely palace on all sides, and the middle part thereof was higher then the rest: so that it might easily be discovered by the inhabitants of the countrey many furlongs off; and especially it was most apparant and subject to their sight, who dwelt opposite against it, or repaired into the Citie. The doors thereof and their transomes were correspondent to the rest of the magnificence of the Temple, garnished with divers tapestries, and azured flowers, which invested and adorned the pillars: under whose chapters a golden vine spread it self on each side, replenished with many goodly clusters of grapes hanging down, which was an admirable work to behold; both in respect of the greatnesse, as also for the workmanship & matter whereof it was made. He encompassed all the Temple with most goodly galleries, and porches correspondent to the magnificence of the same, and surpassing those in times past for the cost, so that never any man before him so magnificently adorned the Temple. Two of which were underpropped with very strong wals, whose workmanship was so exquisite, as it is incredible to be reported amongst men. There was a stony rising or hillock, and very freight and high, the top whereof towards the eastermost part of the city was somewhat smooth and upright. The first that encompassed it with a wall, was Salomon our King, who by Gods favour and the mediation and labour of divers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herod also invested the lower part thereof with another wall, under which to the southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fastned the one unto the other with lead, shutting all within his enclosure, and extending it self very deep; so that the greatnesse and height of this four square building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatnesse of the stones appeared in the front, but on the inside they were fastned together with claspes of iron, which fortified and strengthened the building for ever against all injuries of times. This work having been thus continued to the top, and the void space between the wall and the rising hillock filling up the floore above, was made plain and equall. The whole circuit of the Tower contained about four stades or furlongs, a stade or furlong in length to every pane from angle to angle. On the inside and neer unto the top there was another wall of stone extended along the eastern side, having a double porch of equall greatnesse with that of the wall, and placed in the midst of the Temple, and openeth right upon the gates thereof, which the Kings beforetime had adorned. Round about the Temple were planted those spoils which were taken from the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with all those spoils which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the north side there stood a very strong and defenced fortresse, builded by the Asmonians, who were Herods predecessors, and had been both Kings and high Priests, and had imposed a name on that Tower which was Baris, in which they kept the priestly vesture, wherewith the high Priest was wont to be adorned at that time onely when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herod kept the same in that place, and there remained it after his death, untill the time of Tiberius Caesar: under whom Vitellius governour of Syria came unto Jerusalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence as was possible: and being desirous to acknowledge the favours that he had received at their hands, being requested by them that they might have the keeping of the high Priests ornaments, he wrote unto Tiberius Caesar to grant them that favour; and till the death of King Agrippa the Jews had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Cassius Longinus that governed Syria, and Cassius Fadus Lieutenant of Judaea, commanded the Jews to return the same into the fortresse Antonia, saying that the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had been in times past. For which cause the Jews sent Embassadors to Claudius Caesar, to request his favour therein, who arriving at Rome, found the young King Agrippa there, who besought the Emperour that it might be lawfull for him to have the keeping of the habit: who commanded Vitellius the governour of Syria, to deliver it into his hands. Beforetime it was kept under the seal of the high Priest; and the custody of the Treasurers, and on the eve of a certain solemn feast the Treasurers went up to the Captain, who kept the fortresse for the Romans, and after they had opened their seal, they took the habit: and after the feast was past, they returned it back again unto the same place, and shut it up under the same seal in the presence of the Captain. All which we have thought good to lay open, to make the diversitie known that was used in that care.

After that Herod had in this sort builded this strong tower for the security and guard of the Temple, he called it Antonia, for the love of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefeest men in Rome. In the western part of this porch, there were four gates, whereof the one opened upon the Kings palace, to which there was a direct way thorow the midst of the valley; the two others led unto the suburbs: and the fourth opened upon the rest of the City, and gave open passage unto the same, by the means of a number of stairs, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley; and from thence there was an ascent by other stairs to ascend upwards. For the citie was situate neer unto the Temple, after the manner of a theater; and was bended to the southward by a deep valley. As touching the fourth side turned toward the south, it had likewise certain gates in the midst thereof, and upon the same there was a triple gallerie very royall and princely, the length whereof extended from the orientall valley as farre as the western. For it was impossible to extend it any further. This work was one of the most famous pieces that was ever seen under the sunne: For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottom, if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithstanding on the same he erected this porch of so great a height, that but to look from the top thereof, and to consider the depth as well of the valley as the height of the porch, it would make a man giddie, and his eye could not pierce unto the immeasurable bottome of the same. It had in length four ranks of

of pillars opposed the one right over against the other (for the fourth pane of the wall was fortified with a wall of hewn stone) the thickness of the pillars was such, that it was as much as three men could fadome holding one another by the hand, and the length was of twentie and seven foot, with a double base at the bottome. The whole number of them was one hundred, fixtie and two, and they had Chapters engraven and damaskt with Corinthian work. All this building was so huge, that it moved admiration in those that beheld the same. Betwixt these four ranks there were three porches, whereof two were on either side, containing in breadth each of them thirty foot, and in length a litle or furlong: and more then fiftie foot in height. That in the midst was in bredth once and half as much as these two, and in height twice as much. For it surpassed the rest by farre. The floor was made of goodly planks, engraven with divers figures, and the roof thereof was farre higher then any of the rest, in which certain huge beams were mortised, on which there were certain pillars build- ed, united and annexed to fitly together, that it is a matter incredible to those that have not seen the same, and admirable to him that beholdeth it. Such was the fashion of the circuit of the first porch. In the midst, and not farre off from the other, stood the second, where- unto there was an ascent made with few steps. It was inclosed with a separation of stone, with an inscription, forbidding any stranger to enter the same upon pain of death. This inward porch both to the southward and the northward had three gates, in rank equidistant the one from the other, and toward the eastward had one great gate, by which those men entred who were cleansed with their wives. For beyond that place it was not lawfull for the women to have access. But the third inward space was onely accessible by the Priests. In it was the Temple, and before the same the Altar, on which they were wont to offer burnt sacrifices unto God. But Herod durst not enter the interior sanctuaty, from whence profane men were excluded by the law: but by the mediation of the Priests he intended the structure and building of the inward porch, and finishing in eight yeers space the rest of the edifice, at length also he finished the Temple itself by the endeavours of the same Priests, within the term of one yeer and six moneths. By which means the people were replenished with the fulnesse of joy, and every one gave thanks unto God for that the whole work was finished so speedily, and wished all happinesse to the King for his cost and diligence in the execution and finishing thereof: and they celebrated a great feast in honour of the restauration of the Temple. Then did the King offer up three hundreth oxen unto God, and the rest of them each one according to his abilitie offered so many sacrifices, as that scarcely they may be comprehended in number, for that their multitude exceeded their estimate.

The dedicati- on of the Temple.

About the very time of the celebration of this feast, in the honour of the reedification of the Temple, the Kings day of Coronation fell out, which he was wont to solemnize every yeer with great joy: and for this two-fold occasion the solemnitie and joy was farre more sumptuous and compleat. The King also caused a conduit of water to be made, and con- veighed by pipes under ground, drawing it from the Castle Antonia unto the Orientall gate of the Temple, neer to which he builded another Tower also, to the end, that by the con- duits he might ascend privily unto the Temple, if haply the people should practise any in- surrections against his royaltie. It is reported, that during the building of this Temple, it never rained by day time, but onely by night, to the intent the work might not be inter- rupted: and our predecessours have testified no lesse unto us, Neither is this thing incredible, if we attentively consider those other effects of Gods providence, Hitherto concerning the reedification of the Temple.

CHAP. I.

How ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS, being returned unto their father, were assailed and calumniated by SALOME and PHERORAS.

Amongst the rest of the affairs of the Common-wealth, the King thought it behoved him to redresse and hinder private injuries, both in the citie and countrey: for the which purpose he made a new law unlike to the former, that it should be lawfull for such as were wall-breakers, to be sold for slaves out of the limits of his kingdome: which law did not seem so much to intend the punishment of malefactors, as the dissolution of his own countrey customes. For to serve forrain Nations, who lived not after the maner of the Jews, and to do whatsoever they commanded them, was more prejudiciall unto religion then unto the parties convicted of that fact. Wherefore it was sufficiently alreadie in the old ancient laws provided for the punishment of such people, to wit, that a thief should restore four times as much as he stole: which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be sold, not unto strangers, nor into perpetuall bondage, but onely for seven yeers: at which time he should again be set free. So that the common people did interpret this new law to set down an unjust punishment, and rather to favour of tyrannie, then of princely dignitie, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient laws: so that for this cause all men spake very ill of the King.

At the same time Herod sailed into Italy to salute Caesar, and to see his children living at Rome. Where, Caesar receiving him very courteously, permitted him to take his sons home with him, as being now sufficiently instructed in the liberall arts. Who returning into their countrey, were joyfully received of all their countymen, both for that they were of comely stature, stature, and of courteous conditions, and in their very behaviour did shew that they came of kingly lineage. Which things moved Salome and the rest, by whose false accusations their mother Mariam was oppressed, to envy them, fearing their puissance, and verily perswading themselves that they would be revengers of their mothers injuries. So taking hereby occasion, they began also falsely to accuse them, as misliking their father, who had caused their mother to be slain; and as though they had an aversion from him, whose hands were imbrued in their mothers blood. For they well perceived that by such calumination they might draw them into hatred, and avert their fathers good will from them. Yet did they not carry these their inventions to the Kings ears, but contented themselves to bruit them abroad amongst the common people, which so in the end coming to his hearing, would cause in him such enmity and hatred against his sonnes, as that it would overcome in him all naturall affection.

CHAP. II.

How HEROD gave wives unto ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS.

BUT the King as yet mistrusting nothing, moved with a fatherly care over them, had them in such estimation as reason did require, and for that they were now come unto mans estate, he married them both: and unto Aristobulus he gave Bernice the daughter of Salome; and unto Alexander, Glaphyra the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Which done, understanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Asia, he went unto him thither, and invited him into his kingdome, requesting him to accept of his friends entertainment. Which Agrippa yeelding unto, Herod omitted nothing that might delight him: for he received him in his Cities newly built, shewing him the fair houses and goodly edifices; entertaining him and the rest of his friends and followers with all sorts of delights, pomp and magnificence, as well at Sebastè, as at the haven of Cæsarea, and in the Castles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hircania. He also brought him to Jerusalem, where all the people met him appalled in such goodly and brave attire, as they were accustomed to adorn themselves withall, when as they celebrate their festivals, and with many joyfull acclamations received and saluted him. Agrippa offered a hundred head of fat oxen to God, and feasted all the people; and although he would willingly have made a longer abode there, yet winter drawing nigh, fearing tempestuous weather, he was forced to sail away with all speed into Ionia; both he and his friends being honoured with very great presents.

CHAP. III.

HEROD having past the winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was now with an army minded to go to Bosphorus, the spring time being now at hand, he sailed unto him again, and taking his course by Rhodes and Cous, he came towards Lesbus, thinking there to finde Agrippa: but by a contrary winde he was driven from thence, and forced a while to stay at Chius; where many privately coming to salute him, he rewarded them with princely rewards: and perceiving that the Citie gate, destroyed in the warres against Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but lay still ruined for want of money to repair it, he gave them so much money as largely sufficed to restore it to the former beaurie and bignesse; exhorting them with all expedition to reedifie and adorn the Citie as it was in times past. At last the winde changing, he sailed first to Mitylene, and then to Byzantium; and there understanding that Agrippa had alreadie past the rocks of *Cyane*s, he followed him with all speed, and overtook him at Synope a Citie of Pontus: who contrarie to *Agrippa*s expectation arrived there with his navie: Herods coming was very gratefull unto Agrippa, and with especiall affection they embraced one another. It was an evident signe of friendship, that the King omitting his own private businesse, would now come unto him in so convenient a time. Wherefore Herod still abode with him in the armie, alwayes present either to assist him with counsell, or to bear part of the labour with him. He was also present with him at such times as he meant to be merrie, being his onely counsellour in difficult matters, for the benevolence he bare unto him, and also in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa having dispatcht the businesse in Pontus for which he came, it pleased him not to return by Sea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia; and so they came by land to Ephesus: and there taking ship they came to Samos. And in all that whole journey, almost in every city he gratified Herod, at his intreatie relieving many of their necessities. And Herod did in the way help many with money that wanted, and spent much upon his guests: and moreover if any one had any suit unto Agrippa, Herod was the onely man that might obtain his suit for him. And although Agrippa also was both nobly minded and easily intreated to grant all such things as were not prejudiciall to any man, yet was it a matter of no small moment and importance in King Herod, to incite him to use beneficence, being even of his own accord forward enough to put the same in practise. For first of all he reconciled Agrippa being angry against the Iliensians, and himself paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted unto Caesar's receivers, obtaining for them an intumencie: and he also assisted and pleased others in whatsoever they needed.

How the Jews of Ionia accused those countrey men for offering to take from them their privileges, granted unto them by the Romans.

The Jews of Ionia complain unto Agrippa of the injuries offered them by those countrey men.
Nicholaus did make a speech unto Agrippa
in the behalf of the Jews.

WHEN they came into Ionia, a great multitude of the Jews inhabiting that coun-trei being gathered together, expected him to speak unto him: and finding opportunitie, they complained unto him of the wrongs that those countrey men offered them, not permitting them to live according unto their laws: and that upon festivall dayes they pulled and haled them before their tribunall: and that they would not permit them to send sacred money unto Jerusalem, and that they compelled them to do publike businesse, and to spend the holy money in those affairs, contrary to the privileges granted unto them by the Romans: Herod laboured to have the Jews complaints heard by Agrippa, and willed one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Jews cause:
who made a speech unto Agrippa, sitting with the rest of the Romans nobilitie, and other Kings and Princes, in their behalf after this maner: Most worthy Agrippa, true it is, that all men that suffer injurie, are constrained to flie for redresse to the highest powers: and we, over and above, hope to obtain our suit. For we ask nothing but that which your beneficence hath already granted, and that which they endeavour to take from us that are, as we also are, your subjects. And although that your benefit bestowed upon us was great, yet are we worthy still to enjoy it, onely for that you your self judged us worthy thereof. And suppose it was a small matter, it is a discredit for you not to grant so small a request. Wherefore it is evident, that the injurie done unto us, doth also redound unto you, whose decrees those that have injured us, fear not to contemne, and to disannull your beneficence towards us. For if any one should ask any of them whether they had rather lose their lives, then be deprived of their countrey laws, rites, sacrifices, and festivities, wherewith they honour their gods, I know well they would rather endure any calamitie, then to be forced to forsake their coun-trei customes. For many warres arise onely for defence of religion: and the greatest reward and content that we reap by this happy peace, which through your means we enjoy, is this, that we are every one permitted to live according to the custome of his countrey, & to continue in piety. Wherefore they endeavour to take from others that, which by no means they would permit to be taken from themselves, as who would say it was not as great an offence to hinder other mens piety and devotion, as neglect their own. Let us consider whether there be any city or nation, that doth not account their felicity to be situate in your dominion, and the power of the Romans? or is there any that desireth your honour and power to decay and be of no force? Truly none that is wise: for there is none, whom either publicly or privately it concerneth not: but these people endeavouring to take from us your liberty, do also as it were deprive themselves of all benefits which they have received at your hands, which are infinite. For what a benefit is it, that whereas other nations living under the dominion of rigorous Kings constituted over them, these do onely obey the Romans, and live in happy peace and tranquillity? But as for our affairs, were no man troublesome unto us, yet are they not such as deserve to be envied. For enjoying the common felicity, which others your subjects do, we desire nothing of high estimate or worth, but only request that we may live according to the religion of our countrey, which of it self is not to be envied at, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God doth alwayes love them, who honour him, & them who do not hinder his honour. What is there in our religion offensive to any man? nay, what is there that is not according to all piety & justice, wherby all things continue and are preserved? For neither do we conceal what life we follow, nor the labours and exercise we use, but resting the seventh

A seventh day from all labours, we spend that day in learning our religion, and the laws and customes thereof, esteeming this custome not to be of small force to correct and amend our maners. These our customes having in them nothing that any that searcheth them, can justly reprehend, they are now also, though many are persuaded the contrary, consecrated and confirmed by their antiquitie: So that we must needs make a conscience of it to forsake our lawes, that have endured so many ages. These are the injuries that these people by violence offer us: they sacrilegiously take from us the money dedicated to God: they impose tributes upon us, who are free: they upon festival daies force us to their tribunals, for law and other prophane businesse, without any necessitie: but onely in contumely and disgrace of our religion, which they know well in the mean while that they persecute with unjust and unlawful hatred. For your Empire, equally providing for the good of all your subjects, doth not onely nourish the mutuall concord of them all, but also resisteth hatred and malice. These are the injuries, most worthy Agrippa, whereof we seek redresse at thy hands, it requesting thee that hereafter we may live according to our religion as beforetimes, and that our adversaries may have no more authoritie over us then we over them: which is not onely justice and equitie, but already also granted by your clemency. And there are yet extant to be seen in the Capitol many decrees and ordinances of the Senate concerning this matter, engraven in brasse, which are read unto this day: doubtlesse for our truth and fidelitie so oftentimes tried: or at least, though we not deserving it, yet holy and inviolate. For you doe not onely not withdraw from us and all other nations your former benefits granted unto us, but rather every day beside all hope and expectation increase them: all which time will not suffer me to recount. And that we may not seeme vainly to boast of our duties and obligations towards you, and also omitting other things that are past, our King now sitting with you can sufficiently testifie it to be. For what kinde of love and good will hath he omitted to shew unto your nation? where was he not proved trusty? what hath he not devised to honour you? where stood you in need, when he was not the first man to help you? Why therefore should not we receive some favour for his deserts? I will not omit to put you in minde of the fortitude of his father Antipater, who came with 1000 soldiers to assist Cesar in the Egyptian wars, wherein he so valiantly behaved himself, that neither by sea or land any one in those wars deserved more commendations then himself. I will not recount at this time how much good he did Cesar in those warres, and what and how great rewards he therefore received: but rather I should first of all put you in remembrance of the letters that the Emperour writ unto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith he obtained for Antipater the honours and priviledges of the Citie. For this onely argument had been sufficient to have declared that we did not obtaine such favour without desert, and request thee now to confirme the same, of whom we might justly hope for new benefits, seeing such friendship and familiarity between thee and our King. For we have understood by our nation that dwell in Judaea, how many offerings thou diddest there sacrifice unto our God, and with what vows thou honouredst him: how thou feastedst the people, and wast delighted in that mutuall hospitalitie. All which are as it were an argument of the friendship confirmed between so great a Roman Prince, and the nation of the Jews, even in Herods house. By all these, we humbly request in the presence of the King nothing but this onely, that thou wouldest not permit us deceitfully to be defrauded of that, which you your selves have already granted unto the nation of the Jews.

Now no one of the Greeks offered to oppose himself against that which Nicholau did speak: for this was no contention to a Judge concerning their right, but onely a deprecation and supplication to avoid injurie. Neither did they denie it: onely thus they excused themselves, that the Jews dwelling amongst them, were troublesome unto them. But the Jews shewed themselves to be free citizens, and to live according to their religion and laws of their countrey, without any mans molestation or injury. Wherefore Agrippa understanding that they were wronged answered thus, that he would not onely gratifie them for his friend Herods sake, but also for that they seemed to him to demand a reasonable matter. Wherefore though they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would have granted them whatsoever he might, without prejudicing the people of Rome. And now seeing they onely demand of him that which already the Romans had granted unto them, he would ratifie and confirme unto them the benefit which they had already received at the Romans hands, and provide that henceforth no man should molest them for living according to the institution and ordinances of their countrey. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the assembly. Then Herod arising, thanked him in all their names. And then after mutuall embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaves from Lebus.

How HEROD returned into Judea.

HEROD the King having a prosperous winde, within a few daies after arrived at Cæsarea, and from thence he went to Jerusalem; and calling together all the people, as well the citizens as also the countrey people there present, there he told them the cause of his journey, and how he had obtained immunities for the Jews living in Asia, that they might converse there among the Gentiles, without molestation. Then he recounted unto them, what felicitie they had received and enjoyed by his reign, seeing that his greatest care was so to provide for his subjects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them the more, he told them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the taxes and tribute they were to pay for the year past. The people greatly comforted as well with the Kings speech unto them, as with his liberalitie, departed joyfully, wishing the King all happinesse.

CHAP. VI.

Of the discord in HERODS house, between him and his sonnes.

IN the mean time, the discord of his house was daily increased; for Salome greatly maligned the two young men, as having an hereditary hatred rooted in her heart, and presumed by reason of her good successe in her exploit practised against their mother, to labour all waies possible not to leave any alive, that might revenge her death, who died, not deserving it. And she wanted no occasion, for that it seemed the young men were not very well affected toward their father, partly for the memory of their mothers death, and partly also for that they desired the kingdome. So that they upbraiding Salome and Pheroras, did renew their old hatred against them, who daily practised, by all means they could, to overthrow them: the young men also hated them, but not with like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenious manners and noble race dissembled not their anger, but with lavish tongues declared their mindes. But Salome and Pheroras contrariwise enviously and craftily prepared themselves a way by calumniation, alwaies provoking the magnanimous spirits of these young men, whose fiercenesse might soon bring them into suspicion with their father, to the intent that he might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to revenge their mothers death, yea even with their own hands, forasmuch as they were not ashamed to be the children of such a mother, and would contend that she was unjustly put to death. And now all the whole city talked of them, every one pitying the young mens simplicity: Salome not ceasing to gather by their own speeches probable arguments of suspicion, that they did not onely take their mothers death impatiently, but also raging like young men, did both bewaile her death, and their own case, who were compell'd to live with the murderers of their unfortunate mother, and as it were contaminate themselves with living amongst them. And the absence of the King greatly increased this their dissension; who being returned, and having made a speech unto the people, he presently was admonished both by Pheroras and Salome his sister, that he was in great danger, by reason of the two young men, who did openly boast that they would be revenged of them that killed their mother: feining moreover, that they were incouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus King of Cappadocia would help them, to accuse their father unto Cæsar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and so much the more, for that he heard the same also reported unto him by others. And hereby he was put in memory of that which was past; how that for the dissension of his house he could not long enjoy his friends and dearest wife. And as it were foreseeing by that that was past what would ensue, and fearing some greater calamitie would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And truly as abroad he was most fortunate above all hope, so at home he was most unhappy and unfortunate beyond mens opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate successe abroad did countervail his misfortunes at home, or whether it had been more expedient for him to have had neither the one nor the other, but to have had onely a common and ordinary favour at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himself, he thought it good to call unto the Court another sonne of his, whom he begat when he was a private man, and to grace him with honours, and to oppose him against the other two brethren, to the end, to bring down and repress their fierce and haughty mindes: (this son of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after overcome by affection he did) to make him sole heire of all, but

A but thinking hereby to bridle Mariannes children, and to diminish their arrogancy by letting them see that it was not needfull to keep the inheritance of so flourishing a kingdom only for them: wherefore he introduced Antipater, one opposed against them, that thereby the young men laying their pride aside, might shew themselves more tractable to their father: and so now he thought he had by this means provided for the safety of these young men. But it fell out farre otherwise then he expected, for the young men esteemed this fact as an injurie done unto them: And Antipater was of that nature, that having gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeavour all waies possible to be in greater account with his father then the two young men, who was now through false accusations alienated from them, and every day (as he also desired) ready to beleieve any thing that might incense him against them.

Antipater inciteth his father against his brethert.

B Wherefore this was all his labour: yet had he an especiall care not to be thought an accuser of his brethert, but he used others of his accomplices, whom the King nothing suspected, who for the trust the king put in them, might also have better credit given unto their words. For now this man had many followers and favourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his means, who with a kinde of counterfeited good will made a shew of love and good will towards Herod. And being many in number and trusty one to another, the young men were every day entrapped more and more: for many times they shed tears for very grief of the contumelies and injuries that they suffered, and many times they mentioned their mother, and complained unto those whom they thought to be their friends, of their father, as one that dealt not well with them: all which Antipater partakers maliciously noting, and adding thereunto something of their own invention, they did presently tell it unto Herod, and so did nourish the dissention of his house. For the King being moved hereat, and purposing to humble Mariannes children, did daily increase and augment Antipater honours, and at his entreaties at last brought his mother into the Court, and many times writing secretly unto Caesar in favour of Antipater, he especially commended him in particular unto him: and being to saile to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia, having governed that province ten years, he onely took with him Antipater of all his sonnes, whom also he committed unto Agrippa with many gifts, to goe with him to Rome, and to be brought in to favour with Caesar: so that now all things seemed to be done, as it were by this mans beck, and the young men to be already disinherited.

Herod brought Antipaters mother into his Palace. Herod delivered Antipater to Agrippa, to be carried to Rome.

CHAP. VII.

How ANTIPATER living at Rome, HEROD brought ALEXANDER and his brothers thither, and accused them before CAESAR.

HIS journey did greatly advantage Antipater, and increase his honour and preeminence above his brethert: for he became famous at Rome, being by his fathers letters commended unto all his friends there: yet this was a great grief unto him, that he could not daily calumniate his brethert: for he feared lest his fathers minde should change, and so he should affect Mariannes children most. This was his daily cogitation: but though he were absent, yet he ceased not by letters to incite his father against them, as having care of his safety, but indeed for that he thereby through his bad practices hoped to obtain the kingdom: so that he so increased Herods wrath against them, that he now was become a deadly enemy unto the young men. But endeavouring to resist this affection, and fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to prejudice them, he determined to saile again to Rome, and there accuse his sonnes before Caesar, lest he being led away through indignation and displeasure conceived against the young men, should seeme to cast off all love and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Caesar there, he followed him unto Aquileia: and coming to speech of him, and requesting him to take notice of his misfortunes, he presented his two sonnes, and accused them before Caesar of insolency, and for having attempted to poyson him, complaining their hatred to be gone so farre, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoever they sought their fathers kingdom, notwithstanding that Caesar had given him full power and liberty to leave the kingdom to him, whom he found most dutifull and obedient unto him. And that they though thereby they might not gain the kingdom, yet they could be contented with their fathers death, and that they sought it with danger of their own lives, and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that he having long endured this calamitie, was now forced to open it unto Caesar, and trouble his ears with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Have I deserved this at their hands? what wrong have have I done them? or how can they think it reason, that I who have exposed my self to so many dangers, and undergone so difficult labours for a long time to obtain the kingdome, should not peaceably enjoy the same, and suffer me to be Lord of mine own dominion, and permit me the libertie to leave it unto him who shall deserve such honour in the best performance of a son-like dutie? So that the beholders hereof seeing piety so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited thereunto, especially seeing that without violating the law of nature, it is not lawful to think any such thought: for no man can affect his fathers kingdom, but he doth also desire his fathers death, seeing that it is not permitted men to succeed those in the kingdome who are yet alive. He alleadged moreover, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing convenient for a kinde father to provide for princely children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: that also he had provided for them wives of noble race, and had married one of them unto his sisters daughter, and the other unto Archelaus his daughter King of Cappadocia: and which was the greatest matter of all, he had not used the authoritie of a father against them after these their enterprizes, but brought them unto Caesar their common benefactor: and that forsaking his own right of a father, who had been injured, or of a King, against whom treason had been wrought, he was now content to debate his matter with them before such a Judge, as well knew how to decide the thing in question according to right and equitie: yet requested he him that the offence of theirs might not be left unpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetuall fear: seeing that it was expedient that they should never see light again after such haynous offences, and to escape unpunished, after the violating of all laws of God and nature. Herod having with a vehement voice objected these accusations against his sons before Caesar; the young men were not able to abstain from tears whilest he was yet speaking, and having ended his speech, they wholly resolved into tears: not for that they were guilty of those impieties laid unto their charge, but for that they were accused by their father, against whom it was not decent to speak freely for themselves, nor expedient to refuse to defend their own cause. Wherein they remained doubtfull what to doe, moving the auditors to pitié them by their tears and lamentations, and carefull withall lest it should be thought that their guilty conscience did so trouble them, that they were not able to speak in their own defence, seeing that indeed it was their want of skill and tender yeers, by reason whereof they were so amazed. Which also Caesar well perceived, and all that were present were so moved to compassion, that neither their father who was their accuser could long refrain from being moved hereat to compassion.

of Alexanders defence, and how the two brethren were reconciled unto their father Herod.

Alexander
speakes in his own, and his brothers defence.

Then the young men perceiving both their father and Caesar to relent, and that that were present partly to pity them, partly to shed tears of compassion: the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, framing his speech unto his father, began thus to purge himself of the crimes objected against them: My father, how well and friendly minded thou art towards us, this present judgement declareth: for hadst thou determined any heavy sentence against us, thou wouldest not have brought us before him, who is the preserver of us all: for thou mightest being a King, or for thy authoritie over us as a father, have punished us for our offence according to thy power; but in that thou hast brought us to Rome, and made Caesar our Judge, it is an argument that thou seekest to save us: for no man brings any one to the Temple whom he purposeth to destroy: which greatly aggravateth our cause, who doe censure our selves unworthy to live, rather then to incur an opinion of impiety committed against thee such a father. How far more expedient is it to die guiltlesse, then to live suspected of such offences? Wherefore, if truth be our patrone, we shall be happy either by thy own judgement, or for that we have escaped danger: but if calumniation doe prevaile against us, it is superfluous and to no purpose that we live. For what good would it doe us, if we live in continuall suspicion? It is a probable accusation to accuse our yeers, as having affected the kingdome; and our unfortunate mothers calamity maketh it seeme more probable. But consider I beseech thee, if the same crime may not as well be framed against any one whomsoever, as against us. For any King having children by a wife that is now dead, may if it please him suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to prove a man impious and guilty: wherefore bring any one forth that can tell any argument of this crime by us to have been attempted, which may adde credit to this calumination;

Can

A Can any man shew that poyson was prepared by us for you; or that we conspired with any; or that we corrupted any servants with money and gifts; or that we writ any letters against thee? yet may calumnyation faime every one of these upon no occasion. It is a grievous matter for discord to be in a Princes Court; and the hope of dominion, which your Majesty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impell mens mindes unto hainous offences. But although it be most certain that we cannot be convicted of any crime; yet how can we clear our selves from accusations forged against us, before them that will not hear us? But did we speak some insolent words; yet were they not against thee, O my father (for that had been impiety) but against them who tell all they heare. We bewailed our mothers misfortunes. It is true: but not because she is dead, but because after her death she is evill spoken of by those, who ought not to doe it. We affect the kingdome of our father, he being yet alive. Wherein? Is not that purpose of ours vain and frivolous, we having already been graced with kingly honours? And suppose we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them by killing of thee, whom both earth and seas would disdain after so execrable an offence? Or could we have expected that the loyaltie of thy subjects, and the laws of our nation would have permitted us, having gotten the Kingdome by murdering our father, to have enjoyed the same, and entred into the holy temple, which thou didst repaire? Or suppose we despised them all; yet could any one that murdered thee escape, Caesar being living? Thy children by thee begotten are not so impious nor foolish, though more unfortunate then thy estate requires. And seeing thou hast nothing to accuse us of, or nothing to prove any accusation laid unto our charge, how canst thou be perswaded that we are guilty of such inhumane acts? Is it because our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to have made us more wary then insolent and rash. We could speak more in our own defence, then this, but what need is it to excuse that which was never done? Wherefore we beseech Caesar (who is Lord of all, and now our Judge) onely this, that if thou canst, O my father, put away out of thy minde all suspicion of us, to suffer us to live hereafter, how unhappy and unfortunate soever: for what is more miserable then to be rashly accused without cause? But if thou canst not, we living, live without fear of us, let us die condemned by our own censure. For our lives are not so dear unto us, that we desire to keep them to his molestation that bestowed them upon us.

Caesar with these words, though before not greatly crediting such accusations and slanders laid against them, was now more moved to beleieve that they were guiltlesse, and the rather, for that fixing his eyes upon Herod, he perceived him also to be much moved, and all that were present were sorrowfull for the young men: so that all courtiers present thought hardly of the King, for the absurd and frivolous accusation framed against them; and the flower of their age, wherein they were now endangered, moved all mens mindes what they could to assist them: And much more were they incited, after that Alexander had ingenuously refuted his fathers accusations, the accused remaining still in the same habit and place, and for grief fixing their eies upon the ground. At last some hope appeared, so that the King himself seemed to need some excuse, for having so rashly accused his sonnes, without any certain proof of his accusations. At last, Caesar having a while deliberated with himself, pronounced that the young men were innocent, and guiltlesse of the crimes laid unto their charge: yet herein they were culpable, in that they had so behaved themselves, that they gave their father occasion herein to suspect them. And as for Herod, he requested him to lay aside all suspicion, and to be reconciled to his children. For it was unjustly done of him to beleieve such forged accusations against those whom he had begotten, and that one night recompense another in time to come for their former offences, and renew the good will between them in times past, if to abolish all suspicions, either did hereafter shew himself more friendly to other then before. Caesar having thus admonished the young men, they prepared themselves to intreat their fathers wonted favour: he not expecting so long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all those that were present, both servants and others did the like.

Then giving humble thanks unto Caesar, they departed together, and Antipater with them, counterfeiting himself to congratulate their good hap, for that they were now reconciled unto his father. Within a few daies after, Herod gave Caesar three hundred talents, who was now bestowing his gifts and presents at Rome, and exercising his liberalitie upon the people. And Caesar again bestowed upon him halfe of the revenues out of the mines of the metall in Cyprus, and the other halfe unto the overseer thereof; and gracing him otherwise also, he gave him leave to chuse which of his sonnes he pleased for to succeed him in his Kingdome, or if he had rather to distribute it amongst them all: which Herod presently would would have done, but Cæsar would not permit him, affirming, that during his life he should keep it all whole and undivided, and his sonnes should be subject unto him.

After this, Herod returned again into Judæa, in whose absence the Trachonites that were no small part of his Kingdome, were revolted: yet by the industry of the Captains he left to oversee all in his absence, they were conquered again, and forced to doe as they were commanded. As Herod and his sonnes were sailing towards home, arriving at Bleusa a Citie of Cilicia, which is now called Sabaste, he found Archelaus there, who was King of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteously entertain Herod, and was very joyfull that his sonnes and he were made friends, and that Alexander his sonne in law had so well cleered himself and his brother of the crimes laid unto their charge. And so each one bestowing upon the other princely gifts, they departed taking their leave one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Judæa, and calling the people together into the Temple, told them all that had past in his absence from them, and the courtesie of Cæsar: and told them also of other affairs that he thought meet for them to know; & turning the latter end of his speech unto his sonnes, and exhorting the courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his sonnes should reign after him, and first of all Antipater: and after him his sonnes that he had by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus; in the mean time every one of them should honour him as King and Lord, notwithstanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to govern, seeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his subjects and children in their obedience; and that the souldiers also if they onely respected him, should live in all happinesse and felicitie without molestation. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the people, some thinking he had spoken according to equitie; others thinking clean contrary: For having now as it were caused an emulation amongst his children, there was as it were already a shew of some mutation.

BOUT this time Cæsarea was finished, the tenth year after it was begun to be built, the 28. year of Herods reign, in the 192. Olympiade. In the dedication hereof there was great pompe and sumptuous preparations: for all musicians were brought thither to strive one with another, who was most excellent in their art; and champions that wrestled being naked and anointed with oyle: there was also a great many that fought with swords, and a great number of savage beasts; and all things else that at such times were used, and in account, either at Rome or in other countries. These sports were also consecrated unto Cæsar, and were to be renewed every fifth year. All this provision the King at his own cost and charges provided to be brought from any place whatsoever, to shew the greatnesse of his magnificence. Julia, Cæsars wife also bestowed much of her own to the furnishing hereof, and sent many precious things out of Italy; so that the worth of them all amounted unto five hundred talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold these sports, he received all Embassadors sent unto him from other nations, to thank him for the benefites he had bestowed on them; and he lodged, feasted and sported them: and being all day long amongst the people to see those sports, at night he received them with banquets, and shewing them his magnificence; and gained great praise and commendations for a worthy King. For, he in all things so provided, that the last was more pleasing and gratefull then the first, and caused him to be more admired. And it is reported that Cæsar himself and Agrippa often did say, that Herods magnanimity was greater then his present revenues could bear, and that he well deserved an Empire, as big as all Syria and Egypt. These sports being ended, he builded another town in a field, called Caparsaba, chusing for it a watery soyle fit for plants: the Citie was compassed with a river; and he also planted round about it a wood full of most goodly trees. This town he called Antipatris, after his fathers name Antipater. After which he also builded a castle about Jericho, called after his mothers name, Cyren, which was very strongly defended, and adomed within with rare and sumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brother, he dedicated unto him most goodly buildings: for first he built a tower as bigge as Pharo in the city, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name Phasaelus, which also was the strongest hold and defence in all the citie. After this, he builded a town neer unto the vally of Jericho, as one goes toward the north, whereby the fields that before almost lay desart, were now tilled and inhabited by the townsmen; so that of them it was named Phasaelus field.

field. It were hard to recount all his liberalitie in particular shewed both unto the Cities of Syria and Grecia, and all other places wheresoever he came: for he helped many either by building publike places, or if there were any new works begun, and not finished for want of money, by giving them money to finish them: the chiefeft among all which were, that he builded at his own cost and charge the temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gave them many talents of silver to build their ships. He also builded the greatest part of the publike houses and places in the Citie by Actium, which Cæsar built for the Nicopolitanes there inhabiting, & that with his own proper cost & charges. He also for the Antiochians inhabiting the greatest city of Syria, builded porches on each side of the greater street, that goeth quite thorow the middest of the Citie, and doth as it were part it into two; and the street it selfe that lay open, he paved with polished stone: which work was as great a commodity to the inhabitants, as a beauty unto their Citie. He also helped to maintain the sports at Olympus with yeerly renewes, that now for want of maintenance began to decay: so that by his means there were more solemn sacrifices, and all things more sumptuous to please them that came to behold them: for which his liberalitie he was declared perpetuall master and maintainer of those sports. It is admirable to see in one man such diversitie of mindes: for on the one side if we respect his liberality and beneficence towards all men, we must needs say, he was of a most free and bountifull nature; contrariwise, if we consider the injuries and crueltie he shewed against his subjects and dearest friends, we must confesse him to have been a hard man, and intractable, and who passed all bounds of modesty; so that we would think him to have been of two contrary dispositions. But I am otherwise perswaded, and think that both these did proceed from one matter: for because he thirsted after glory and honour, and wholly applied himself thereunto, he became liberall wheresoever he was, in hope either to reap present thanks for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore spending above his renewes for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable unto his subjects: for it was necessary that he that so lavishly bestowed such huge summes of money upon others, should some where get it, though with evill means. Lastly, seeing himself for such like injuries hated of his subjects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wils, which he could doe no waies else, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abused the hatred of his people for his own commoditie: for if any one of them did not tolerate that slavery wherein they lived, or did endeavour to shake off the yoke of his domination, against such he used a marvellous cruelty; and outraged them no lesse, then as if they had been his enemies, neither respecting friendship nor kinred; for that he desired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may guesse by the honours he did unto Cæsar, Agrippa, & others of their friends: for he desired to be an example to his subjects, that as he himself honoured men better then himself, so they should all honour him likewise: thereby declaring what thing he did naturally most desire. But the Jews religion doth not permit them licence to honour Potentates, who of necessitie ought to have greater care and respect of right and equitie, then of such officiousnesse toward superiours: for it was disprofit enough unto the Jews, that they could not with statues and Temples obtain the Kings favour, and with like flatteries satisfie the fond appetites of a vain-glorious man. And this seemeth to me to be the reason that Herod was unjust, and hard towards his friends, and to those whom he made partakers of his counsels and enterprizes; and frank and bountifull towards strangers.

Of the Embassage of the Cyrenian and Asian Jews unto CÆSAR.

THE Asian and Cyrenian Jews were greatly afflicted by the citizens of those countries, who having had the same priviledges granted unto them by the ancient Kings that the citizens had, were now greatly injured by the Greeks: as though they carried money out of the countrey, and were prejudiciall unto the rest of the inhabitants. And the Greeks making no end of these their injuries, they were constrained by Embassadors to complain of them unto Cæsar: who wrote unto every Province, that it was his pleasure that the Jews should enjoy like priviledges with the other inhabitants of the countrey. The copy of which writing we have here set down, that it may the better appeare, how the Roman Emperours of ancient times were affected unto our nation.

Cæsar Augustus Pont. Max. Trib. potestatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the Nation of the Jews hath alwaies been trusty unto the Romans, not onely at this day, but also in all former ages, and especially in the time of our father Cæsar the Emperour, under Hircanus their high Priest: I have ordained, that according to the common sentence of the Senate, they shall live after their countrey laws, under which they lived in the time of Hircanus the high Priest of God: and that their Temple shall retain the right of a sanctuary, and that it shall be lawfull for them to send votive money unto Jerusalem by certain persons: and that they shall not be compelled to appeare before any Judge upon their Sabbath daies, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clock upon the preparation day. And if any one be known to steale the holy books, or holy money laid up in their places appointed for religion, he shall be guiltie of sacrilege: and his goods shall be confiscate unto the treasure of the people of Rome. I also decree for the good will I bear unto all men, that their memoriall or request offered unto me by C. Marcus Censorinus, shall together with this my edict be published in that famous place, which all Asia hath dedicated unto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any shall be so hardie as to doe contrary to our decree, he shall be punished extraordinarily. This was engraven in a pillar in Cæsar's Temple. Cæsar wisheth health unto Norbanus Flaccus: Let it be lawfull for all Jews wheresoever living, to carry their sacred money unto Jerusalem, according to their ancient custome, and that no man should forbid them so to doe: and this did Cæsar write in favour of the Jews.

Agrippa writ unto the Rulers of Ephesus, in the Jews behalf, and to Syllanus and the Magistrates of Cy-renia.

Agrippa also wrote in the Jews behalf, as followeth: Agrippa wisheth health unto the Magistrates, Senate, and people of Ephesus: I will that the Jews living in Asia keep their sacred money, which according to the custome of their countrey, they are wont to send unto Jerusalem: and if any one shall steale their holy money, that the same person, if he flee to a Sanctuary, shall be violently taken away from thence, as a sacrilegious person, and delivered unto the Jews to be punished. He also wrote unto Syllanus the Magistrate, that the Jews might not be constrained upon their Sabbaths to appeare before a Judge. M. Agrippa wisheth health to the Cyrenian Magistrates and Senate. The Jews inhabiting amongst you, for whom Augustus hath already written unto Flavius the President of Libya, and unto other Magistrates of that Province, are not to be hindred from sending their holy money to Jerusalem, as their custome is: and they have now complained unto me, that they are molested by the false accusations of some bad people, and forbidden to doe it under pretence of a certain tribute, which notwithstanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to live after their custome, and free from all such matters: and if in any of your Cities any sacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certain persons which you know to be fit for that purpose, ye make choice of them, to send it again unto the Jews. Item C. Norbanus Flaccus proconsull: Health unto the Magistrates of Sardinia: Cæsar hath written unto me, commanding that no man hinder the Jews, according to their custome, to send sacred money unto Jerusalem: wherefore I also write unto you of the same, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæsar's also. Moreover, Iulius Antoninus proconsull did also write to this effect: Health unto the Magistrates, Senate and people of Ephesus. The Jews of Asia in the Ides of February, I sitting in the judiciall seat at Ephesus, signified unto me that Cæsar Augustus and Agrippa have permitted them to use their countrey customes; and every one, according as he thinketh good, to contribute his free fruits for religion sake, to be carried without let or hinderance unto the Temple of the most mighty God: and they desired me to ratifie by my consent, that which they had already granted them by the above named Emperours. Wherefore I would have you to know, that I also, according unto Cæsar's and Agrippa's decrees and ordinances, doe permit and grant them also to doe all things they please, according unto their countrey customes, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

Caius Norbanus Flaccus
writeth in the Jews behalf.
Julius Antoninus proconsul.

I have thought good to annexe these decrees, for that I know that these my writings will come unto the Grecians hands, that I may shew them, that in former ages we were esteemed of the publike Magistrates, that none were permitted to hinder us from using our countrey rites and ceremonies, and that by their consent we worshipped God in our own religion, which I doe inculcate the other, that I may move strange and forraign nations, and ease any their hatred conceived against us, which is without all reasonable cause. For no nation doth alwaies use the same customes, but almost whole towns among themselves doe sometimes alter and differ from the rest, yet is justice equally to be distributed unto all men: which is most profitable, as well to the Greeks as to other barbarous nations, which is greatly observed in our laws, which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all nations love us. Wherefore we request all men not to despise us, for that we differ from them in religion, but favour us

A in that we follow vertue. For this is common to all nations : and without this, mans life cannot stand. But I will now return unto my history.

CHAP. XI.

How HEROD, having need of money, opened DAVIDS Sepulchre.

HEROD spending lavishly much and many sums of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who reigned before him, opened Dauids Sepulchre, and took out of it three thousand talents of silver, and that there was left yet farre more, able to defray any great charges whatsoever, he long time purposed to doe the like. And at this time in the night season accompanied onely with his most trusty friends, being very wary that none of the people should know of it, he entred into the Sepulchre : but he found no money there, as Hircanus did ; but he took from thence a great company of precious attires and ornaments of gold, whereby he was inticed to make a more diligent search : and he sent two of his company for the nonce into the inner part of the Sepulchre, where the bodies of Salomon and David were intombed ; who were there lost, and as it is reported, fire came out of those secret places and consumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it, and moved with religion to make satisfaction, he builded a most sumptuous monument of white marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre : of which building Nicholaus also a writer of that time, maketh mention ; but he speaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of David, thinking that therein he should not keep decorum, if he should make mention thereof. Wherein he followed this accustomed order : for his writings were to come to the ears of the King yet living, wherein he did onely curry favour, mentioning onely that, that might redound unto the Kings credit : so that many of his open and wicked pranks, he did either colour under some other pretence, or else all waies possible he endeavoureth to hide them. For he doth as it were tell a tale of Herods cruelty against Mariamme and his sonnes ; as though he did thereby deserve credit and praise, accusing her of adulterie, and them as Traitors unto their father : and this he doth clean through his works, too much extolling the Kings good deeds, and too diligently excusing his bad deeds and iniquities. But as I have said, we must pardon him, who did not so much write to leave a memory of things done unto after ages, as to gratifie and please his King. But I, who come of the linage of the Asmonian Kings, and execute the office of a Priest, account it a shame to lie : and doe intend truly to recount the history of all things that were acted and done, yet with a reverence of the posteritie of that King, who doe also now beare sway and rule ; yet with their pardon and leave, having a greater care to the verity of our history, then to them.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herods house began to decay, whether revenge lighting upon that part which was already scarce sound, or whether by meere chance such calamitie at that time befell him, as might justly be thought the reward of impiety. For there was a discord in the Court not unlike to civill wars, every one striving against other with hatred and forged accusations : but especially Antipaters politick practice against his brethren was to be noted, who intangling them by other mens forged accusations, himself oftentimes seemed to take upon him their defence, that making a shew of good will unto them, he might secretly oppresse them the sooner ; and he did so craftily circumvent his father, that his father deemed him to be his onely conservator. Wherefore the King commended Ptolomeus his procurator unto Antipater his soune, and did communicate all his secrets unto his mother, so that all things were done according as they pleased, and they made him displeased with those, against whom they knew the Kings displeasure might redound unto their profit.

But Mariammes children did every day stomach the matter more and more, disdaining to give place unto their inferiour : and for their nobilitie not enduring to be removed from their places, and not to keep their dignitie also, their wives did the like, and Alexanders wife Glaphyra, who was the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly envy and disdain Salome, and she also her again, both for the love that she bare unto her husband, and for that she disdained (as women are wont) that her daughter married unto Aristobulus, should bein equall honour with her. Pheroras also the Kings brother had a hand in this other contention about a private cause of suspicion and hatred. For he fell so farre in love with one of his maides, that he refused the Kings daughter offered unto him, rather making choice of his maid. Herod took this in very ill part, seeing his brother (who had received so many benefits at his hands, and was almost his fellow in his Kingdome by his means) not to shew the like brotherly affection to him again as he then ought, and himselfe to be an unhappy brother. And seeing he could not dissuade him from that madnesse, he married his daughter unto Phasaelus his sonne: and afterward thinking that now his brothers minde towards his maide was satisfied, he complaining of his injurious dealing, in repulsing his daughter, offered unto him to wife, he now offered him another of his daughters named Cypros. Then Protemus advised Pheroras not still to contemn his brothers offer, and persist in such folly; telling him it was meere folly therefore to incur the Kings displeasure and hatred, and losse of tranquillitie. Pheroras understanding this counsell profitable for him, having been once before injuriously accused, and obtained pardon at the Kings hands, sent away his maide, by whom he now had a sonne, and promised the King to marry this his other daughter, and appointed the thirteenth day after to celebrate his marriage; making a solemn oath unto the King, never after that time to use the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, he fell so farre in love with the former woman, that he would not stand to his promise, but again accompanied with his maid.

Salome inticed
her daughter to bewray her husbands
secrets.

Then Herod, not able any longer to contain himselfe, used many speeches, whereby he evidently shewed his minde to be alienated from his brother. And there were many who taking hereat opportunitie, did by forged calumniationes encrease his alienation: so that now there was no day nor houre past, wherein he did not still heare some new alterations and stirres amongst his dearest friends, whom nature willed to combine themselves to maintain concord and amitie. For Salome being now offended at Mariammes children, did not permit her daughter married unto Aristobulus, one of the young men, to enjoy mutuall love and comfort of her husband, enticing her to bewray her husbands secret talke: and if she heard any small occasions of offence (as often it falleth out) she should the more aggravate them with suspicions, whereby she also learned all their secrets, and made the young woman hate her husband. And she to please her mother, recounted how that often when her husband and Alexander were alone, that then they were wont to talke of Mariammes their mother, and use reprochfull words against their father, and threatening, that if they ever did obtaine the Kindome, they would make the sonnes of the King, whom he had by other wives, notaries and town clerkes, and so they might reape profit of their learning which they now studied for: and whensoever they saw any of the Kings wives weare any of Mariammes apparell, that then they vowed in stead of that attire, to cloath them with sackcloth, and shut them up where they should never see sunne. Salome presently told all this to the King: who though he were much grieved hereat, yet he chose rather to seek to amend it, then to punish them: for he was greatly incited against them by suspicion, and every day waxing worse and worse, at last he beleevved all the reports of any whomsoever. But he then contented onely sharply to chide his sonnes, and pacified with their excuses and answers, he for that time was quiet.

Herod greatly moved against Pheroras, for affirming that he was in love
with Glaphyra

But presently the mischief was again set on foot: for Pheroras the Kings brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we have said) was Glaphyra her husband, who was daughter to Archelaus: he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was far in love with Glaphyra, so that he could not shake off this affection. The young man hearing this, became jealous, and was in a great rage: and now what honour soever or gifts Herod for the love of his sonne gave her, Alexander did interpret it in the worst sense, being now made jealous by that which he had heard of Pheroras; and not able to put up such injuries, as he thought, he went unto his father, and with tears recounted unto him what Pheroras had told him. But Herod was hereat the more enflamed, not enduring himselfe falsely to be accused of so shamefull a fact, inveighing against the great malice of his friends, who for his great good turns he did them, so rewarded him. And presently sending for Pheroras, very sharply began to chide him, saying: O most impious that liveth amongst men! art thou become so ungratefull, either to speak or think such a matter of us? Thinkest thou that I doe not perceive thy drift, that thou speakest not these words unto my sonne to discredit me, but also to the intent by this means thou mightest work some treason against me, and cause me to be poisoned? For who but a good sonne, as this is, would suffer his father, suspected for such a matter, to live; and not to be revenged of him for such offence? Whether dost thou think that thou didst put these speeches into his minde, or by them a sword into his hand to kill his father withall? or what was thy intent, seeing thou hatest both him and his brother, and onely counterfeiting good will toward me, to belie me, and to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought: get thee hence, thou wretched imp, seeing thou hast thus abused thy brother, who hath well deserved at thy hands; and doe as thou wilt all thy life time, my selfe will endeavour to be better unto my children, then I have been; and neither will I punish them as they deserve, but I will

A will honour them above their merits. The King having discharged his choler against his brother Pheroras; and he being taken in a manifest fault, answered, that that report was first devised by Salome, of whom he heard it: which she (being then present) hearing, began to exclaime, saying, it was not her device, and that they all laboured to make the King hate her, and put her to death, being one who did especially wish him well; and what in her lay, seeking his safety, and that now he was in danger of more treason then ever before: for (said she) I was the onely cause that you did put away the woman, whom you so doated after, perswading you to marry the Kings daughter: and this is the cause that you hate me. With these speeches tearing her hair, and striking her brest, she made a shew of innocency: but this her gesture was a colour to hide her bad intent. So Pheroras was left in great perplexitie, not knowing what to say or doe; and finding no pretence to excuse his fact: for on the one side he confessed, that he told it unto Alexander, and on the other, he could not make Herod beleieve, that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while: at last the King being wearied, sent away his brother and his sister: and greatly commending his sonnes moderate minde, and that he had given him intelligence of those speeches, very late in the night, he went to supper.

The year of the world, 3957.
before Christs Natiuitie, 7.

Salome excuseth her selfe.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, because she was judged to be the authour of this ill report, and the Kings wives wished euill unto her, because they knew her to be of strange qualities and hard to please, and so variable, that according to the time, one while she would professe friendship, and presently after hatred. Wherefore they still had something to informe Herod of against her, taking occasion hapning by chance, which was this: There was a King of the Arabians, named Obadas, a sloathfull man, and one given to idlenesse: and there was one Syllaus that did govern all his affairs; this man was a crafty fellow, and in the prime of his youth, and very beautifull. This Syllaus coming unto Herod about some businesse, and viewing Salome, who then sat at supper with him, began to set his minde upon her: and finding she was a widow, he entred into talke with her: and she finding her brother now not so friendly unto her as before he had been, and also intangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him, and many feasts being made at that time, they shewed evident signes of their mutuall content, and love one unto another. The Kings wives told the King of this in scoffing sort. Herod herewith not contented, demanded of Pheroras how the matter stood, and willed him at supper time to note if he could espie any tokens of familiaritie betwixt them: And Pheroras told him that by signes and mutuall viewing one another, they sufficiently shewed their intents. After this the Arabian being suspected, departed into his own countrey. But two or three moneths after he came again into Judaea, onely for this purpose, and talked with Herod touching this matter, requesting him to let Salome be his wife: affirming that that affinitie would be profitable unto him for the traffick between his people and the Arabians, whose Prince he was to be, and did already enjoy a great part of the dominion. Herod told all this unto his sister, and asked her if she would marry him; and she answered, she would. Then they requested that Syllaus should become a Jew in religion, or else it was not lawfull for him to marry her. He would not condescend hereunto, affirming that he should be stoned to death by his people, if he did it; and so he departed without obtaining his purpose. From that time forth, Pheroras, & especially the Kings wives accused Salome of intemperancie, affirming that she had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marry his daughter unto Salomes sonne, whom Pheroras refused for the love of his maid, which son of Salomes was her eldest that she had by Castabarus; and that to shew his good will toward Salome his sister. But he was dissuaded by Pheroras, who told him that the young man would never love such a father in law, because of his fathers death, perswading him rather to marry her to his eldest son, who was to succeed him in his Tetrarchy: which he easily perswaded the King unto, and so obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore the spousals being changed, the maid was married unto the young man, who had an hundred talents in dowry with her, more then otherwise should have been given with her.

The effect of calumination.

Syllaus the Arabian desiring Salome to wife, was denied.

Herod married his daughter to Pheroras son.

F But all this while the dissension of Herods house did not cease, but rather increased; he having a shamefull beginning, and coming to a sorrowfull end. Herod had three Eunuches, whom he greatly esteemed for their beauty: one of them was his butler, the other his cook, and the third his chamberlain; whom also he was wont to employ in serious affairs of his kingdom. Some one or other informed the King, that these three Eunuches were corrupted by his sonne Alexander with great sums of money, and being upon tortures examined if they had accompanied with him, they confessed all: yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attempted against his father. But their torments being increased by Antipaters favourites;

favourites, they were forced to confesse that Alexander secretly hated his father, and he exhorted them to forsake Herod, who was now good for nothing; who dissembled his age by painting his face to make himself seeme younger then he was, and colouring his head and beard black, which were already grown very white through age: but rather set their mindes upon him, who would in despite of his father enjoy his kingdom due unto him, and that then he would advance them to the highest honors of the Kingdome: for he had not onely title unto it by his birth, but also was now prepared likewise to invade it; and that he had many of the captains, of the souldiers, and many of the Kings friends on his side, who were prepared to doe or endure any thing for his sake.

Herod hearing this, fear and anger did invade him, by reason that his sonnes words seemed both contumelious and threatening: and being for both these causes in a rage, he feared some greater matter to be put in practice against him, which he could not suddenly, and having so little warning, avoid; and not daring to make open inquiry, he set secret spies a work, to tell him how all matters stood, himself now mistrusting all men, and accounting it his securitie to mistrust all, even them that deserved it not: and not moderating his suspicious minde, now whosoever was the neereft unto him, was the most suspected, as of most power to injure him. As for others, that were but onely named by his spies, he presently esteemed it his safety to put them to death. Then they of his household, every one being carefull to save himself, were one turned against another, every one deeming it his own safety to prevent others, by accusing them unto Herod: which done, presently they incited other mens envy against him, and every one of them to desire such measure as they had measured unto others: and thus they also revenged their private quarrels, & presently after, they themselves were taken, and did by other mens means suffer the like, being entrapped in the same trap they set for their enemies. For the King did quickly repent himself, because he had put very many to death, who were not convicted: yet for all that, he was not hereby admonished to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged so farre, as to cause him to inflict the same punishment upon the accusers, which he had done upon them. So great trouble and fear then fell upon all the whole Court. He then commanded many of his dearest friends, and them especially whose fidelitie he had beforetimes experienced, not to come in his sight, nor within his court gates. For he did now shake off the friendship between Andromachus and Gemellus and himself, who were his ancient friends, and oftentimes had gone Embassadors for him, and alwaies been of his counsell, and had been tutors unto his children, in whom he had alwaies reposed more trust then in any others: the one of them, for that his sonne Demetrius was familiar with Alexander; and Gemellus, for that he knew him to wish well unto Alexander: for he was one of them who had brought him up, and had abod with him at his being at Rome. And no doubt but he had censured them with some more heavy sentence, had it not been that they were so eminent persons. Wherefore at that time he was contented to have banished them, and deprived them of all their authoritie, to the end, that having disgraced these good men, he might the more freely play the Tyrant. Antipater was the cause of all this mischief, who from the first time that he perceived his father to be fearfull and suspicious, still after thanjoined with him as counsellor, and as it were increased his rage and crueltie, and then he gallantly played his part, endeavouring, that whosoever would resist him, should be made away. Wherefore Andromachus and the rest of his friends being now banished the Court, the King presently tortured all that he imagined any way to favour Alexander, to see if they were guilty, or if they knew of any treason to be practised against him: but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidst their torments. Where he so much more tortured others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not so much as an evill thought against him; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceale the truth, then to shew themselves not trully to their masters and friends: wherefore many being taken, he caused them to be tortured to get something out of some of them. At last one amongst the rest, not able to endure those torments imposed upon him, said; that he had often heard Alexander say, so often as any one commended his goodly stature, or skilfull shooting, and the rest of his vertues, that these qualities nature bestowed upon him rather then other benefits; for his father for envy hereat was offended: so that when he talked with him, he did upon purpose draw his body together, lest his father should perceive the talenesse of his stature; and that when he went a hunting with him, he upon purpose did misse the mark he could have hit, because he knew his father could not endure that he should be commended. And whilest these words were considered, and pondred, and his torments intermitted, he again accused Alexander to have conspired with his brother Aristobulus, to kill his father when he was hunting, and then to flee with speed unto Rome,

A Rome, and begge the kingdome of Cesar. There were also found some of this young mans letters written unto his brother, complaining of the injurious dealing of his father, who had given certain grounds unto Antipater, the yeerly revenews whereof amounted unto two hundredth talents. Then Herod thinking himself to have probabilitie enough, his former suspicion was now confirmed, and so he took Alexander and cast him in prison: and again he began to rage, notwithstanding that himself did scarcely beleve the informations against him: neither could he himself devise any cause wherefore they should seek to work treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish: neither was it probable that having openly killed his father, he would afterwards have gone to Rome. Wherefore endeavouring to finde some stronger argument of his sonnes impiety, and because he would not be thought rashly to have committed his sonne to prison, he caused the most noble and eminent of all Alexanders well-willers to be tortured, and they confessing no such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

The year of the world, 3917. before the nativity of Christ, 7.

Alexander being in prison, his friends were tortured. One accused Alexander to have sent letters to Rome against his father.

Whilest thus all the Court did resound with fear, torments, and contentions, a certain man accused Alexander to have sent letters to his friends at Rome, to entreat them to cause him to be sent for by Cesar thither, that he might accuse his father of certain conspiracies against Cesar, and how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates King of the Parthians, then the friendship of the Romans: affirming also, that he had poyson ready prepared at Ascalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by the parasites about him, as having not done any thing rashly, and so he gave now full credit unto all: yet the poyson was diligently sought for, but could not be found. Alexander being now oppressed with this calamitie, he yet took courage, and because he would more incite his fathers displeasure against him, he did not deny it: perhaps meaning to make his father ashamed of himself, for giving credit so easily unto forged tales; or at least, if he could not effect that, entangle all the Court and him too in calamity and misery: Which that he might the better do, he writ four little books, and sent them unto his father, telling him that it was needlesse to use any more torments, for indeed treason was intended against him, and that Pheroras and his most trusty friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly unto him, and as it were forced him to lie with her, and that all of them ayimed at this mark, to have him made away, that so they might enjoy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolomeus and Sapinnius of this conspiracie, who were more faithfull unto their King, then all others: so that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hastily pursued every one, that they had no leisure given them to speak in their own defence: neither was their punishment deferred till their cause was tried, & the truth known, that some were bound and imprisoned, other some presently put to death, other laughed in their sleeves to see that day, yet discontented for that any delay was used for their punishment: so that the Kings Court was now greatly defaced with sorrow, and heavinesse, wherewith the wonted felicitie thereof was destroyed. Herod himself amidst these calamities, could not but be weary of his life, who not daring to trust himself in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourly fear of some untimely death, that would befall him: and many times perswaded himself, that he did see his sonnes before him with a drawn sword, ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, so that herewith he almost ranne mad.

Alexander confesseth the treason, and who had a hand in it.

Herod was so troubled with the contention in his house, that he was weary of his life.

CHAP. XII.

How Archelaus King of Cappadocia reconciled Alexander unto his father.

Whilest Herod was thus troubled in his minde, Archelaus King of Cappadocia carefull for his daughter, and the young man his sonne in law, and pitying his friend Herod entangled in such calamities, he thought it his duty to make a journey unto him. And finding him so affected as it was reported unto him before his coming, he thought it an unfit way to argue him of too much credulity and rashnesse, perceiving that thereby he would be rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himself. Wherefore Archelaus devised another way to appease these troubles. Wherefore he counterfeited indignation against the young man, approving all the Kings actions for good, affirming that he would break the band of wedlock between his daughter and Alexander, and that if she knew of the conspiracy, and did not inform the King thereof, himself would punish her. Then Herod, contrary to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence committed against him, began to remit his anger: and now with just con- siderconsideration weighing what he had done, by little and little, he began to have a fatherly affection, and to be hereby moved to compassion; yet so oft as any one sought to excuse the young man, he grew to be very angry thereat: but when Archelaus also began to accuse him, then Herods heart relented, and he with tears besought Archelaus not to yeeld too much to anger, nor for the young mans offence break off the marriage. Then Archelaus perceiving him to relent, began to turn the matter against Herods friends, as the causers of all this mischief, who had corrupted the yong man, who of himself was void of malice; and especially he aggravated the matter against Pheroras the Kings brother. Pheroras having now incurd the Kings displeasure, perceived that none could so soon reconcile him unto the King, as Archelaus; wherefore clothed in black, and making other signes as though he despaired of his life, he went unto him, who did not deny to help him what he could: yet he told him that it was no easie matter for him to pacifie the King so highly offended; perswading him rather himself to go unto the King his brother, and crave pardon of him; confessing himself to have been cause of all this mischief, by which confession of his the Kings wrath would be greatly appeased, and so he also should have better occasion to entreat for him. Pheroras followed his counsell, which fell out happily for them both: for the yong man, contrary to any ones expectation, was freed from all his troubles, and Archelaus made Pheroras and Herod friends; and he himself having now gotten great friendship of the King in those his adverse and troublous times of his, he returned joyfully into Cappadocia, being rewarded with rich gifts, and being accounted of as Herods chiefeft friend. They also agreed amongst themselves, that Herod should go to Rome, because he had already written unto Cesar, concerning this matter: and they both went together unto Antiochia, and there Herod reconciled Titus the President of Syria unto Archelaus, and so he returned into Judæa.

WHilest Herod going to Rome was absent from his kingdome, the Arabian warres began, hereby taking an occasion: The inhabitants of Trachon, whose countrey Cesar taking from Zenodorus, gave it unto Herod, being forbidden and hindred from stealing, were now forced to frame themselves to live like husbandmen in more civilitie then before: but this kinde of life pleased them not, neither did their countrey yeeld fruits worth their labours; yet at first Herod compelling them thereunto, they abstained from injuring the inhabitants bordering upon them, which did greatly redound unto Herods credit, by whose diligence they were brought unto it. But when Herod was sailed into Italy to accuse Alexander, and to commend Antipater unto Cesar, the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, revolted and turned to their accustomed robberies: Yet were they at that time again subdued in the Kings absence by the captains that he left at home; and fourtie of the chiefeft of the theeves amongst them being taken, the rest terrified by their example left their own countrey, and fled into Arabia, where Syllas received them, in revenge that he could not obtain Salome for his wife, and receiving of him a strong hold to dwell in, they did not onely make incursions, and rob and spoil the borders of Judæa, but also of Coelosyria, and drave away the preys they got, into the place allotted them, Syllas protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endamaged by these theeves: and seeing he could not subdue them, by reason the Arabians did protect them, not enduring that injurie, and entring into Trachon, he killed all their families: whereby they were so much the more enraged against his countrey, for they had a law amongst them, whereby they were commanded to revenge the death of their families, and so contemning all dangers, they came and wasted all Herods countrey with continuall incursions. Then the King complained hereof unto Saturninus and Volumnius then Presidents sent thither by Cesar, requesting that he might have the theeves to punish them. They hearing this news, with as much speed as they might, gathered their forces together, and making themselves stronger then they were before, with sudden incursions waited all where they came, destroying both the fields and villages, and killing all they could finde; so that now this resembled a warre, rather then a robbery: for now they were a thousand in number. Wherefore Herod required these theeves and robbers to be delivered unto him, and required the debt that Obodas ought him, for Herod had lent Obodas threescore talents, and sent them unto him by Syllas, and now the time was expired wherein the money was to be repayed. But Syllas, who had taken all the rule from Obodas, and himself now governed all, denied that those theeves were in Arabia, and deferred the payment of the money: so that

A that now this matter was debated on before Saturninus and Voluminus then Presidents of Syria. At last it was by them determined, that within thirtie dayes, the money due to Herod should be repayed, and the runawaies of both countries delivered each to other. But there was no one Arabian that either had fled unto Herod for any offence committed nor for any other cause: but the Arabians were convicted to receive the theeves that fled from Herod.

CHAP. XIII.

How HEROD went into Arabia with an army.

WHEN the day was come that was appointed, Syllas not minded to stand unto the agreement made, went in the mean time to Rome: But Herod exacted his money, and the theeves to be restored unto him, Saturninus and Voluminus permitting him with force of arms to persecute those obstinate people: so he levying an armie, went into Arabia, in three dayes space going as farre as ordinarily men are wont to march in seven, and coming unto the Castle wherein the theeves kept, at the first onset he took it and destroyed it, being called Repta, and did no other harm unto the inhabitants. And a captain of the Arabians, named Nacebus, came to succour the theeves, and so fought with Herods armie, in which battell a few of Herods men were slain, but of the Arabians were slain five and twentie, with their Generall, and the rest were put to flight. Being thus revenged upon the theeyes, he led three thousand Idumaeans into Trachon to keep the inhabitants from robbing, and sent letters unto the Roman Governors, who abode in Phoenicia, that he had onely used the authority which they gave him against the rebellious Arabians that resisted him, and nothing else: which afterward also, they making enquire, they found true.

CHAP. XV.

How SYLLAS accused HEROD unto CAESAR.

BUT then were messengers hastily sent unto Syllas at Rome, and informed him otherwise, aggravating every thing according to their fashion. Syllas being new before insinuated into Caesars acquaintance, by chance was then also about the Palace, and hearing these news, he presently changed his apparell, and cloathing himself in black, he went in this manner unto Caesar, informing him how Arabia was afflicted with warres, and that the whole kingdome was wasted by Herod, who had entered into the countrey with an army, and with tears complained that 2000. and 300. of the Arabian nobility were slain, and amongst them his friend and kinsman Nacebus, and great riches were taken away, which were laid up at Repta, and that all this was done in contempt of Obodes who had no army ready, nor a fit Captain for his forces, he being not there. Syllas having thus spoken, adding moreover, that he would not have come to Rome, but that he was perswaded that Caesar would have had a care of the common peace, and tranquillity of his subjects, and that had he been at home, Herod to his cost should have violated that peace. Caesar hereat was greatly moved, and enquired of some of Herods friends, who were then present, and of certain men that were lately come out of Syria also, whether Herod had led an army out of the limits of his own kingdome. Which they not denying, and Caesar not vouchsafing to hear the cause why, his displeasure against Herod was greatly increased, so that he writ threatening letters unto him, telling him that hitherto he had used him as a friend, but hereafter he would use him as a subject, which also Syllas signified unto the Arabians. By which letters of his they were made proud, and would neither render unto him the theeves that were escaped, nor restore the money he lent their King, nor pay him rent for the pasture ground that they hired of him: bouldering themselves herewith, that the King had offended Caesar. Moreover, the Trachonites hearing this, rebelled against the garrison of the Idumaeans, and joyning with the Arabian theeves, who wasted their countrey, not so much respecting their own gain as their revenge and particular profit, they did many mischiefes, and exercised great crueltie against them. Herod did put up all injuries, and durst not once murmur, Caesar being offended at him, for the which cause he was not so courageous nor valiant as before. For first of all, Caesar would not admit his Embassadors, whom he sent to plead his cause before Caesar, and Herod again sending other Embassadors, Caesar sent them back again, their businesse undone.

Wherefore Herod being in this perplexity, greatly feared Syllas, who being now at Rome, did did easily perswade Cæsar any thing; for that Cæsar was now very credulous; and Syllens G aymed at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Eneas succeeded him in the kingdome of Arabia, who changing his name, called himself Aretas: whom Syllens by forged calumnia-tions did seek to depose from the crown, and usurp the kingdome unto himself, giving great summes of money unto the courtiers, and promising great summes unto Cæsar; whom he now perceived to be angry against Aretas, for that without his consent he presumed to take upon him the government of the kingdome. But at last he also sent letters and gifts unto Cæsar, and amongst the rest a crown of gold worth many talents, and in those letters he accused Syllens, who as an impious and disloyall servant, had poysoned his king Obodas; in whose life-time he had also invaded the government of the kingdome, committing adultery with the Arabians wives, getting together other mens money, thereby to obtain the kingdome. H Cæsar would not permit these Embassadors to have audience; but refusing their gifts, suffered them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affairs of Judæa and Arabia every day became worse and worse, every one seeking to trouble the estate of both kingdomes, and no man endeavouring to quiet them. For the king of Arabia was not yet established in his kingdome, and therefore could not controul his subjects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himself, he should so much the more incite Cæsar against him; and so was forced to put up all injuries that were done unto him: and finding no end of his miseries, he finally determined to send again to Rome Embassadors, to see if by the help of his friends, Cæsar might be perswaded to think better of him, and so committed that Em-bassage unto Nicholaus of Damasco, and sent him to Rome.

Of EURYCLEES his calumniation against HERODS sonnes.

Herods familiarity.

Eurycles insinuated himself into Alexanders friendship.

T this time the dissention of Herods house was much increased; and although at all other times his Court was never void of suspicion, which is a pernicious evil to kings and Princes, yet at that time especially this mischief was in his princi-pall vigor and force. For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian and a noble man of his countrie, but having a turbulent wit given over to flattery and pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both vices, coming unto Herod and giving him gifts, and receiving greater gifts at his hands, was by him courteously entertained; and familiarly conversing with him, brought it so to passe that he was received amongst his especiall friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipaters house, being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: for he said that Archelaus king of Cappadocia and himself was great friends, and therefore he counterfeited himself to reverence Glaphyra very much; and all men judging him indifferent unto all parties, he diligently noted whatsoever past, and every word that was spoken, seeking by all means he could, matter to gratifie others by carrying of tales; and with such flattering fair speeches he insinuated himself into every mans friendship, that he seemed as Alexanders sole trusty friend, and to use other men as it behoved a friend.
And by this his deceit, he so insinuated himself into Alexanders favour, that the young man thought him to be his onely friend, unto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander opened unto him his grief, for that his father was something alienated from him, and recounted unto him his mothers misfortune, and that Antipater had now gotten all autho-ritie and dignitie from him and his brother, and was the onely man that could do all; and that these injuries were no longer tolerable, their father being now incited against them, that now he would neither admit them unto his counsels, nor banquets. And he committed his griefs (as he then thought) into his friends bosome. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speak of it for the great-nesse of the danger then imminent, willing him to beware of Alexander, who did not stick openly to shew what minde he bare, but did as it were manifestly shew that he desired to make away his father. Which done, he received of Antipater most rich gifts, as pledges of his good will towards him; and finally he was by him perswaded to relate his news himself unto Herod. The king lent a greedy eare whilest he recounted Alexanders malice; and was so moved with the circumstances of his speeches, that he conceived a deadly hatred against his sonne, which also without further delay he did make manifest: for he rewarded Eurycles for his pains with fiftie talents. Which he having received, went unto Archelaus, and talking and speaking well of Alexander, recounted unto him in what stead he had stood him in reconciling him unto his father: and receiving of him also a summe of money, he departed before his malice was discovered, and returned into his countrie, and using the like shifts

A there also, he was finally by his countrey men banished from Lacedæmonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before he was, to hear onely that which was told him of Alexander and Aristobulus, did now himself also conceive a proper hatred against them, himself observing all things, and making diligent inquiry though no man accused them, and permitting all men to speak what they list against them. And amongst the rest, Evaristus of Cous had conspired with Alexander, and he seemed now to hear no talk more willingly then this, and such like. But then greater misfortunes then all the rest befell the young men; false accusations never ceasing to be forged against them, and every one as it were, striving to accuse them of some crime or other unto the King, pretending the care they bare of his safetie. Herod had two champions, Jucundus and Tyrannus; both acceptable and gratefull unto him, for their strength and tall stature and bignesse of body: these two for some offence were banished the Court, and received into Alexander's service, and placed amongst his stipendiary horsemen, and for that they were very active, he bestowed many gifts and much money upon them. Whereat the King presently conceiving suspicion, began to torture them, and after many torments they confessed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod as he was a hunting wilde beasts: for so it might easily be bruited abroad, that he falling off his horse, fell upon his own lance, and so was slain: which once before had almost happened unto him. They also declared unto him, that certain gold was hidden and buried in the stable: and they also accused Herods chief Huntsman, that at Alexander's command he had given Alexander's servants the kings lances and his armour. After them the Prefect of the castle of Alexandrium, was taken and examined upon tortures, and it was objected against him, that he promised to receive them into the Castle, and to deliver unto them the Kings treasure there. But he denying it, his own sonne affirmed all to be true, and brought forth letters to testifie the same, resembling Alexander's hand, written to this effect: So soon as by Gods assistance we have done that which we intend to do, we will presently come unto you: be careful therefore, that according to your promise you do receive us into your Castle. Herod having had a view of these Letters, did now without any hesitation believe, that indeed some treacherous practise was plotted against him by his sonnes. But Alexander affirmed, that Diophantus the scribe had counterfeited his hand, and that the Letter was Antipaters device. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in such matters, and afterward being taken with the like, he was therefore put to death. And the King produced them that had been tortured at Jericho before the people to accuse his sonnes, where they were stoned to death, and the people herat moved, would also have killed Alexander and Aristobulus with the same death. But Herod, by the means of Protenus and Phorus did restrain them, and commanded the young men to be cast into prison, and there to be kept so streight that no man was admitted unto them, but many spies were set, who should narrowly mark all their actions and words: and now they were accounted as condemned men, both by other mens opinions, and also by their own. One of them, to wit, Aristobulus, for grief inverting his aunt, and mother in law to compassionate his present calamitie, and to hate him that was the author hereof, affirmed that she also was in great danger, being accused, in hope to marry with Syllanus, to have signified unto him by Letters all that pass in Herods Court. Which words the woman presently came and recounted unto her brother Herod. The King no longer able to bridle his furie, commanded them both to be bound and kept in severall places one from another, and each of them to write what they had plotted against their father: and being thus commanded, they wrote that they neither prepared treason, nor yet thought of any treason against him, onely they purposed to flie, because they perceived that they could no longer live here, because they were so suspected and in continual care. At that time a Prince of Cappadocia came Embassador from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greatest Lords of the countrey: and Herod willing to shew his sonnes malice, he sent for Alexander out of prison, commanding him to recount how and after what order, or whether they meant to flie: he answered unto Archelaus, who had also promised them to send them to Rome, but that they had no further intent or purpose to effect any unlawful practise against their father, and that all other accusations were false. And that he requested that Tyrannus and the rest might have been better examined, but Alexander prevented that, who by his own forged rumours spread amongst the people, did cause them to hasten their deaths. Which being said, Herod commanded both him and Mela to be led unto Glaphyra, that she might be asked whether she were any way privy to the conspiracie against Herod: and coming unto her, the woman seeing her husband bound, presently tore her hair, and being amazed, with great compassion, cried our main. The young mans cheeks were also bedewed with tears, so that along time after, those that were present amazed and moved to compassion at this miserable miserable fight, could neither speak nor do the Kings command. At last Ptolomeus, to whose charge Alexander was committed, willing him to speak whether his wife was privy to his intent: he answered, How could it be otherwise, who is dearer unto me then mine own life, being mother of her and my children? then she answered, crying out aloud, that she was privy to nothing that was any harm; yet (quoth she) if it will avail you any thing, or help to save your life, I am ready to tell any lie whatsoever seeing I must die, and will deny nothing you would have me to say. Alexander answered, Neither did I purpose any impiety against my father, as some suppose, who ought not to think so: neither dost thou know of any one: this thou knowest, that thou and I purposed to flee unto Archelaus thy father, and that he promised to convey us to Rome, which she also affirmed.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was convicted of evill will towards him, delivered letters unto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to passe by Eleusa a town of Cilicia, and deliver certain letters unto Archelaus himself to the same effect: and that from thence they should go to Rome; and if so be when they came there they found that Cæsar had been reconciled unto him by Nicholaus his means: that then they should also deliver certain letters unto him, declaring all that was past between him and his sonnes, and the proofs alleadged to convince the young men. Archelaus writ again unto Herod, that indeed he would have entertained the young men, for fear that any greater mischance should befall them or their father, by reason of the suspicion against them; yet was he not minded to send them to Cæsar, nor to have confirmed them in any malicious course. The messengers coming to Rome, found Cæsar reconciled to Herod, and delivered the letters unto him. For Nicholaus his embassage was to this effect: So soon as he came unto Rome and had entred the Palace, beside the charge he had given him, he did also undertake to accuse Syllanus. For he perceived the Arabians at variance amongst themselves, and that some of them had declared all Syllanus his bad practises, and that by his means and procurement many of Obodas kinsmen were murdered, as his adversaries manifestly proved, by certain of his letters which they intercepted.

Now Nicholaus desirous to reconcile Herod unto Cæsar, omitted not this occasion by chance offered him; for he well knew that if he began with the Kings defence, he should then finde a hard and heavy Judge against him; but if he began to accuse Syllanus, he should finde also fit occasion to plead his Kings cause. Wherefore Nicholaus taking upon him to prove the accusation against him at the day appointed, he accompanied with the king Arctas Embassadors, accused Syllanus as a murderer of his Lord and King, and many other Arabians; and that he had borrowed much money to trouble the peace of the Commonwealth; and that he had corrupted many women, and honest matrons both at Rome and in Arabia. He added hereunto a most grievous crime, to wit, that he by his lies and false reports had deceived Cæsar, whom in all things he had misinformed concerning that which Herod had done. Which when he once mentioned, Cæsar commanded him to omit the rest; and onely to recount the matter concerning Herod, whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an army, and did slay two thousand and five hundred men, and carry away captives and robbe and spoil the countrey? Nicholaus answered, that to these demands himself was able to answer, that Herod did none of these, or at least very little hereof, which he did recount; and that he did not deserve any displeasure. Cæsar, contrary to his expectation, hearing this, began to give diligent eare to what Nicholaus said: and hereupon Nicholaus recounted unto Cæsar, how Herod had lent five hundred talents, and that he had a writing in pawn, wherein he was permitted after the day appointed, if then it were not repayed him again, to prey upon all the whole countrey, and satisfie himself: and that this was no hostile invasion, but according to law and equitie, a requiring of his right and debt due unto him. And that this was not rashly done, though by the writing he was so permitted to do, but by the consent of Saturninus and Volumnius Presidents of Syria, in whose presence Syllanus swore by Cæsar good fortune at Berytum, that within thirtie dayes after both the debt and also certain fugitives from the King, should be restored unto him, and that Syllanus performed none of these: and so Herod went again unto the Presidents, and they permitted him to go and take pledges for his money, and that so by their permission he went into Arabia. And this (quoth he) is the warre that his adversaries have so tragically exaggerated, and yet (quoth he) how can it be called a warre? seeing that it was done by the consent of the Presidents, and that by covenant after perjurie, wherewith both other gods and also Cæsar's name was violated. It now (quoth he) remaineth that I speak something concerning the captives. There were fourtie theeves of Trachon, and afterward more, that fled from Herod for fear of punishment, and fled unto Arabia, whom Syllanus protected and succoured to the injurie of all men, and

and gave them ground to inhabit; and was partaker of their preys; notwithstanding that by his foresaid oath, he was bound to restore them together with the borrowed money; neither can he name any man beside them taken in Arabia, and carried away captive, and some of them also escaped. This his forged tale concerning the captives being thus refuted, hear, O Sovereign Cæsar, the lying invention, which to provoke thee to wrath, himself devised. For I am well able to affirm this, that when the Arabian army assaulted us, and one or two of our men were slain, then at last Herod forced to make resistance, he slew Nacebus, and with him five and twenty, and no more: for every one of which Syllanus falsely recounted unto Cæsar a hundred, and so told him that two thousand and five hundred were slain. Cæsar hereat greatly moved, with an angry countenance looking upon Syllanus, he asked him how many Arabians were slain in the fight? He amazed and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cæsar commanded the writings to be read, containing the conditions between them, & the writings of the Presidents, & the letters of the Cities containing the complaints of the robberies. And so the matter was brought to passe, that Cæsar was reconciled unto Herod, and condemned Syllanus to die; and repenting himself to have written so threatening letters unto Herod, he objected that also unto Syllanus, affirming, that by his false informations he had caused him to passe the limits of friendship, in using his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllanus into his countrey, that after he had satisfied his creditors, he might be punished according to the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas, for that without his authoritie he had usurped the crown and kingdome; and he was minded also to bestow Arabia upon Herod: but the letters which Herod sent him changed his minde. For Olympus and Volumnius, so soon as they understood that Cæsars wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they delivered unto him the letters as they were commanded: wherein were contained the arguments whereby his sonnes were convicted of treason against him. Which Cæsar having read, he thought it not convenient to trouble the old man (infortunate with his sonnes) with another kingdome; and so he admitted Aretas Embassadors: and chiding them that their King had rashly usurped the kingdome without his authoritie and knowledge, not expecting his pleasure, he received their gifts; and confirmed him in the kingdome by his authoritie. This done, being now reconciled unto Herod, he writ unto him that he was sorrowfull for him, that had such children, and that he should, if they had attempted any treason against him, punish them as men that sought to murder their father: for he gave him free and full authoritie, but if they onely attempted to flie, he should also be satisfied with a lesse punishment. Wherefore he counselled him to call a Consistory at Berytum; and together with the Roman Presidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends, and the nobilitie thereabout, according as they should advise him, so to do. And this was the effect of Cæsars letters.

CHAP. XVII.

How HERODS sonnes were condemned in the councill at Berytum.

HEROD receiving this letter, rejoyced above measure, both for that he had again obtained Cæsars favour; and also for that Cæsar had given him full authoritie to do what he pleased unto his sonnes. And yet I know not how it came to passe, that he who in his prosperitie was a hard father, yet did shew himself not rash in putting his sonnes to death: and now his estate being better then it was, and he recovering his wonted assurance, he now began a new hatred. Wherefore by letters he called together all those whom Cæsar appointed, onely Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or else for that he feared he would have withstood that his purpose: and when they were all come together, as well the Presidents as the rest who were called out of divers cities, he would not bring his sonnes into the councill, but kept them in a village of the Sidonians, named Platan, not farre distant from the citie, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himself alone entring into the councill before an hundred and fiftie men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his sonnes before them, and used a speech not onely pitifull for his own calamities, but also little becoming a father. For he was very vehement and unheedy in inveighing against their offence, neither did he sufficiently expresse his minde, shewing many signes of fury, and anger; neither did he deliver in writing any proofs of the accusations unto the Judges: but undecently himself alleadged there the father against the sonne, himself also reading before them certain letters written by them, wherein was contained no impietie nor treason, but onely a consultation to flie away, and certain hard speeches whereby they shewed themselves offended.

Herod assembled all that Cæsar willed, except Archelaus.

Herod accused his sonnes.

Which when he came unto, he exclaimed as though hereby they confessed their treacherous practises, greatly exaggerating the matter, and protesting that he had rather die then hear such speeches. Lastly, affirming that both nature and Caesar permitted him authorities against them; and his country laws so commanded, that if any one being accused, his father or mother should lay their hands upon his head, and the standers by must presently stone him to death: which though he might easily do in his own country & kingdome, yet he thought good also to expect their censures. Yet he came unto them, not for that they were to judge his sonnes, who were taken in a manifest crime, but that by this occasion they might adde their suffrages to the just indignation of a father offended, and that they might leave an ample unto all posteritie, that such treasons ought not to be left unpunished. The King having thus spoken, and not permitting the young men to be brought unto their answer, all seeing what the King intended, and that there was now no hope to reconcile the young men unto their father, or save their lives, they all confirmed his authority. And first of all Saturninus, one that had been Consull, and had been graced with many honours, pronounced an indifferent sentence, limited with circumstances, to wit, that he condemned Herods sonnes, yet not to die: for (quoth he) my self have sonnes, and I would not adde this calamitie to Herods misfortune past. After him also his three sonnes, who were their fathers Legats, pronounced the same sentence. But Volumnius pronounced, that they had deserved death, who were so impious towards their father, whose sentence after him the most part followed: so that it seemed that they were now ordained to be put to death. Presently Herod carried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus, who was now there arrived, returning from Rome: unto whom the King first recounting what was done at Berytum, he asked of him, what his friends at Rome thought of his sonnes. He answered, that they judged the young mens intents impious, and that they also judged that they ought to be bound and imprisoned; and then after due consideration, if it were so thought expedient, to be put to death, lest the King might be thought rather to have given place unto his choler then unto reason: yet if it might so please him, they thought it best to acquit them, lest otherwise he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of most of his friends at Rome. Then the King along time pondred these his words, and made no reply, but commanded him to sail along in his company. At his arrivall at Caesarea all men were carefull what should become of his sonnes, expecting an end of that tragedy, for they greatly feared that by reason of the old discord he would now cut them off; yet notwithstanding they were sorrowfull for them: yet it was dangerous either to speak rashly, or to hear any thing spoken freely concerning them, but in their hearts compassionating them, they concealed their griefs. Onely one amongst all the rest, an ancient souldier of the Kings named Tyro, others dissembling their grief, spake freely what he thought: this Tyro had a sonne of Alexanders age, and beloved of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidst the multitudes exclaimed, that truth and equitie was now banished from out of the world, and that in their stead, malice and untruth reigned: whereby there was such a mist and a fog caused over the whole world, that no man could see his own errors. This his free speech though it was not without danger, yet all men herat were moved, for that he had some reason to shew his fortitude in so dangerous a time, and every one was willing to hear his speech: and though themselves for fear were silent, yet did they not reprehend him for speaking freely. For the expectation of the event of so great mischief was able to have wrested from every one of them words of commiseration. Tyro with great audacity also came unto the King, and besought him that he might talk with him alone: which the King granting, he used these words with great lamentation: I can no longer, O my King, suppress this my grief, which causeth me so boldly to speak, though with my own perill; yet if it please thee my King, that which I intend to speak shall be for thine advantage.

Where now my Lord are thy wits? where is that thy couragious minde ever hitherto able to match all difficult businesses whatsoever? how hapneth it that thou hast so few friends and kindred? for I account not them kinsmen or friends, that permit such wickednesse and hatred in thy Court, which earst was most happy and fortunate. And what art thou unto thy self? wilt thou not look and see what is done? wilt thou put to death the two yong men born unto thee by the Queen thy wife, who abound in all vertue; and commit thy self now in thy old age unto one onely sonne, who nourisheth impious hopes and designs? and to thy kindred, who by thy own censure have often deserved death? Doeft thou not perceive, that the people keeping themselves quiet and still, do both condemne the error of thy friends, and also pities and compassionate the two young men? Moreover, all thy souldiers & the captains themselves have compassion on them, and curse the authors of this infortunate calamitie.

The

The King at first took these words of Tyro in good part, as being admonished of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his own calamity. But Tyro immodestly and souldier-like urging the King, and for his own simplicitie not able to discern what fitted that time, the King at last thought this rather a turbulent upbraiding him, then a friendly admonition: and asking who those Captains and souldiers were, he commanded them all and Tyro also to be bound and kept in prison. Then one Tripbo the Kings Barber, taking hereat occasion, told the King that Tyro had often solicited him, as he shaved the King, to cut his throat with his razor, promising him for a recompence great rewards, & that he should be one of Alexanders chief friends. Having spoken these words, the King commanded him to be apprehended, and the Barber, and Tyro and his sonne to be tortured. Tyro his sonne seeing his father in most miserable torments, and that he still persisted in them (and by the kings displeasure, conjecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his father, that he would confesse all the truth, conditionally that his father and himself might be no more tormented: and having his request granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand should have killed the King: for he could get opportunity to come unto the King when no man else was with him, and so he would kill him, & for Alexanders sake endure any torments whatsoever. This spoken, he delivered himself and his father from further tortures: but it is uncertain whether the tale he told was true, or whether he devised it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aside (if before he were in any) thought what death his sonnes should die, and leaving no place to repentance and mercy, he hastned to execute his purpose: and producing 300. captains, and Tyro and his sonne, and the Barber his accuser, he accused them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they slew them every one. And Alexander and Aristobulus was carried unto Sebastie, and there by their fathers command were strangled: and their bodies carried by night into the castle Alexandrium, where their grandfather by their mothers side, and many of their progenitors lay buried. But perhaps some will nothing marvell, that a hatred so long a breeding should in the end so prevail, that it overcame naturall affection. But one may justly doubt whether the fault were in the young men, who exasperated by a hard father so long time, fell into such hatred of him: or whether it is to be imputed unto his unkindnes and immoderate desire of honour and rule, who could not abide any to be his equall, but rather chusing to do all at his own pleasure: Or rather unto fortune, whose power the wisest living is not able to resist. Wherefore I am perswaded, Fortune hath predestinated all humane actions so, that they must have a necessarie event. And this inevitable force we call fate or farall destinie, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it sufficeth briefly to have touched this high matter, which is of it self very difficult, which attributeth something unto our actions, and examineth the causes of the variety of our actions, which speculation is already comprized in the two volumes of our law. Furthermore, touching the young mens fault, we may accuse their youthfull arrogancy, and their free king-like pride, who did give too great care to their fathers accusers, and for that they were unjust searchers into his life and actions, and that they maliciously suspected him, and could not rule their tongues: but hereby gave double occasion unto their adversaries, and matter unto those tale-bearers that sought to get the Kings favour. But their fathers shamefull fault cannot be excused, who suffered himself so to be over-ruled with passion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his own body, without any proof or argument of the crimes laid unto their charge: yea two young men of excellent feature of body, not onely beloved of their own nation, but also of strangers, not slothfull in hunting, and commendable in military affairs, and eloquent in civill discourses. For in all these things they were excellent, and especially Alexander the eldest of them. It had been enough for him, suppose he had condemned them, either to have kept them in perpetual prison, or banished them into some farre countrey, seeing that he was assured of the Roman power, under whose protection he neither needed to have feared invasion, nor secret treason against him. For so soon to put them to death, onely to satisfie his own furious wil, what else doth it betoken, but only an impious liberty casting off all fatherly humanity and kindnesse? especially, seeing that he was aged, whose yeers could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceived. For neither was he the more excused by the delay he used: nay, it had been lesse offence, if amazed with some sudden news, he had been incited to so hainous an offence, but after so long delay and deliberation at last to effect such a matter, betokens a bloody minde and obdurate in wickednesse, as he well shewed himself afterward to have, not sparing the rest, whom before he held most dear: who though they were lesse to be pitied in that they justly suffered, yet was it an argument of his like cruelty, in that he abstained not from their deaths also: but we will speak hereof hereafter.

AFTER that Antipater had made away his brothers through the extreme impietie & unbridled furie, wherewith Herod their father was incensed & whetted against them, yet incontinently obtained he not that which undoubtedly he hoped for. For being delivered and discharged of that fear he conceived, lest his brethren should be partakers with him in the kingdome, he found a difficult and dangerous matter for himself to finde the means how he might obtain the kingdome: so strange and hainous a hatred had all the nation conceived against him. On the other side, in shewing himself proud and loftie, he more and more whetted and increased that hatred which the souldiers had fore-conceived against him, in whom notwithstanding, the securitie of the kingdome consisted, if it should fortune so to fall out that the people should attempt any alteration. All which mischiefs were begotten by his own sinnes, and the unnaturall murder of his brothers. Nathelesse he governed the kingdome with his father, living in no lesse authoritie then himself; Herod also reposed more confidence in him even in those things, for which he was worthe to lose his head. For the King conceived that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accused his brethren, as under resolution to continue his father in securitie, and not for any hatred he bore as well unto them, as to his father, though indeed he hated them for his fathers sake, being transported with fury. But all these were but as so many subtill stratagems to insinuate himself into Herods counsels and favours: and these did he craftily make use of, to cut off the occasion lest any should prevent or accuse him of that which he pretended to do, and that Herod might be deprived of all means and manner of relief, if so be Antipater should bend his forces against him. For the treason he complotted against his brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare unto his father: but at that time he was the more egged on to prosecute his intended purposes, without any delay or procrastination. For if Herod should happen to die, it was a matter most assured that the kingdome should be his; and should his life continue any longer time, and the

A the practise Antipater went about should be discovered, seeing himself invironed with these dangers, he should be enforced to make his father his enemy. For which cause he used very great bountie and liberalitie to all those that were about his father: and through the great largesse he bestowed upon them, he strangled and extinguished that hatred which all of them bare unto him; and above all things he continued himself in credit with those friends, which Herod had at Rome, by sending them divers presents, and namely to Saturninus, who was Governor of Syria. He hoped also by bribes and rewards to draw his fathers brother into his faction, and to corrupt the Kings sister also, who was married to one of the Kings most esteemed friends in Court. Furthermore, he was a subtil and politike man in entertaining those men with colourable and cloaking shew of friendship, with whom he conversed, and to draw himself into credit with them: contrariwise, he was sufficiently practised to dissemble his malice and discontents, which he had conceived against any man. Notwithstanding all this, he could not deceive Salome his aunt, who of long time before had founded his inclination, and who was not so simple as to suffer her self to be deceived; but had already by all cunning means that might be, prevented his malice, although she had a daughter married unto his uncle, by the mothers side. This daughter was first of all wedded to Aristobulus, and afterwards by Antipaters means espoused to his uncle. For Callias her husbands sonne had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the matter so much, but that his malice was discovered, neither could that former consanguinity extinguish the deserved hatred conceived against him. Herod constrained Salome (who through amorous passion had thought to have married her self to Syllas the Arabian) to marry with Alexas, and that by the mediation and perswasion of Iulias Casars wife, who advised Salome not to refuse that marriage, for fear lest he should prove her utter enemy; for that Herod had made an oath, that if Salome condescended not to marry Alexas, he would never make account of her: For which cause she followed Iulias advice, who was Casars wife, and counselled her also to her profit and preferment.

The year of the world, 3961. Before the nativity of Christ, 3.

Antipater spared no cost to winne his fathers friends.

Antipater could not deceive his aunt.

Herod compelled Salome to marry Alexas.

At the same time Herod sent his daughter to King Archelaus, who had been married to Alexander, presenting him a dowrie out of his own treasury, lest there should any difference arise between them, and he himself carefully brought up his sonnes children. For Alexander had two sonnes by Glaphyra, and Aristobulus begat on Bernice, Salomes daughter, three sonnes and two daughters. These sometimes would he present and commend unto his friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his sonnes, would beseech God that no such ill fortune might befall their children, but rather that they might increase in vertue, and acknowledge their education and bringing up, with all dutifull respects unto their parents. He provided them also each of them with a wife, at such time as they were ready for marriage, namely, the daughter of Pheroras for the eldest of Alexanders sonnes; and the daughter of Antipater for Aristobulus eldest sonne: and one of Aristobulus daughters was married to Antipaters sonne; and the other he espoused to Herod his own sonne, whom he had begotten of the daughter of the high Priest. For it is lawfull in our countrey, and according to our custome, to have divers wives at one time. The King procured these marriages through the compassion he had of those Orphelins, thinking by these mutuall alliances to cause Antipater to be their friend. But Antipater conceived no lesse hatred toward the children, then he had done malice towards their father. For the care that Herod had of them, increased his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greatest among the brethren, and he especially feared lest when they should grow to mans estate, they would reach his power, being assisted by king Archelaus, as his sonnes in law; and Pheroras who was tetrarch should do the like, for that he had married his sonne to Alexanders daughter. And so much the more was he incited, because all the people had compassion of these Orphans, and had conceived a hatred against him, who never ceased to expresse his malice against his brethren. He therefore devised all the means that were possible to disannull the decrees which his father had resolved upon to this effect, being very loath that they should ever live to be partners with him in the kingdom. So that at last Herod condescended to Antipaters demand, which was, that he might marry Aristobulus daughter, and his sonne he espoused to Pheroras daughter: and thus were the promised and forementioned marriages wholly cut off, yea even against Herods former decree. At that time Herod had nine wives, namely, Antipaters mother, the high Priests daughter, by whom he had a sonne that bare his name, and a daughter of his brothers, and a cousin of his own, by whom he had no children. He had another wife also, that by nation was a Samaritane, by whom he had two sonnes, Antipas and Archelaus, and a daughter called Olimpias, who was afterwards married to Ioseph the Kings cousin. As for Archelaus and Antipas, they were brought up at Rome, with a certain private friend of his. Moreover, he espoused one that was called Cleopatra, that was born in Jerusalem, by whom he had Herod and Philip, which Philip was brought up at Rome. By Pallas he had Phasaelus: by Ebedra and Helvia he had two daughters, Roxana and Salome. As touching his eldest daughters, Alexanders sisters by the mothers side, whom Pheroras had refused to take in marriage, he matched the one with Antipater his sisters sonne, and the other he wedded to Phasaelus his brothers sonne, and this was Herods progeny.

of ZAMARIS the Babylonian Jew.

ites, and mak-

After this, intending to assure his estate in the countrey of Trachonite, he resolved to build a borough of the bignesse of a City in the midst of the countrey, as well to warrantize his countrey, as to be in better readinesse to repulse his enemies, and to repulse them with more expedition. And having intelligence that a certain Jew was come from Babylon with five hundred Archers on horseback, and about one hundred of his kinsmen, and had adventured to passe Euphrates, and was in the countrey adjoining to Antioch neer unto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine General of the Roman army had given him a Castle, called Valatha to inhabit, he sent for him and his followers, promising to give him both lands and Lordships in the signiory of Baranea, which confineth on Trachonite, intending that he should make head against those that would assail him, and promising him that both his land and his souldiers should be exempt from all tributes, and payments of customes. This Babylonian Jew was induced by these offers of his to come, and take possession of the place, where he builded a borough, called Bathyra. This man opposing himself against the Trachonites, defended them of the countrey, and those Jews that came from Babylon to Jerusalem to offer sacrifice, from all incursions and robberies of the Trachonites: and divers that observed the religion of the Jews, resorted unto him from all places, so that this countrey was very well peopled, by reason of the enfranchisement of the tribute, which continued during Herods life time.

But Philip, who succeeded him, exacted afterward some small tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the great, and his sonne of the same name, vexed them very grievously with taxations; yet permitted them to enjoy their liberty, whose successors the Romans imposed many grievous tributes upon them, yet continued their freedome, of whom hereafter we will more particularly and largely discourse in due place, and in proesse of my history. Now this Jew Zamaris, to whom Herod had given the possession of his countrey, died, after he had lived vertuously, and left a vertuous off-spring behinde him, amongst whom was Jacim renowned for his dexteritie on horseback, who with his troupe of horse was of the King of Babylons guard. This Jacim died when he was very old, and left his son Philip to succeed him, a man valiant in arms, and addicted to all sorts of vertue, as much as any one that hath been renowned in writing: for which cause King Agrippa loved him and put his trust in him, and committed the trust and trayning of his souldiers unto him, who led them also forth if any occasion of service was proffered.

ANTIPATER conspireth against HEROD.

Hedio & Ruf-
fous, chap. 3.

Whilest the estate and affairs of Herod were thus disposed, all mens eyes were fixed upon Antipater, after that Herod had permitted him to intend his particular profit. This permission was granted him under the hope that his father had, that he would behave himself faithfully, and affectionately towards him: but he abused his authority more audaciously then could be expected; for he traiterously coloured his conceived malice, and easily drew his father to beleve him in whatsoever he said. He was feared by all men, not onely for his force and authority, but for his subtilties and policies. But above all the rest, Pheroras respected him most, and was in like manner as greatly esteemed by him. For Antipater had circumvented him by the means of certain women, who favoured his faction: for Pheroras was commanded by his wife, his mother and sister in law, notwithstanding that he hated them, by reason of the outrage they had offered to his daughters who were virgins; nathelesse he was enforced to dissemble all things, because he could do nothing but that they were alwayes round about him, and had such masterie of his affairs, that they wrought him to perform whatsoever they pleased. To these likewise was Antipater neerly tied,

Pheroras deceived by women.

A tied, both of himself and by his mother: for these foure women were of one minde and affection in all things, and spake as it were by one mouth: yet was Pheroras at odds with Antipater upon some slight millikes, and she that wrought this debate betwixt them, was the Kings sister, who had of long time espied all their drifts, knowing well, that their mutuall friendship tended to the overthrow of Herod: neither refused she to expresse what her opinion was therein. And they knowing well that the King disliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was privie to that which they pretended, which was his utter ruine, resolved between themselves to refrain their publike familiaritie, and to make a shew that they were at odds one with another: to which intent they reproached one another, especially at such time as they were either in Herods presence, or there was any one with them, who (as they thought) would certifie him thereof. But in secret they intermitted not their accustomed friendship, and continued their intercourses with more privie affabilitie; and such was their ordinary demeanour and behaviour: yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they first devised this drift, neither afterwards when they put it execution: for she diligently noted all things, & aggravated the same in their reports to her brother, whom she informed of their secret assemblies and banquetting, urging their secret consultations, which (as we said) had no other issue but his ruine, except upon their discovery he sought to repress them in time. Further, that for the present they behaved themselves like enemies in outward shew, and all their speeches tended to disgrace one another; but that in secret they were friends, and that in private they entertained their amitie, and promised each other their mutuall assistance to strengthen themselves against those to whom they were loth their friendship should be discovered. These things observed, she with all diligence signified the same unto her brother, who of himself already had many probabilities thereof. But he durst not make shew thereof, because he knew that his sister was a woman too much addicted to reproachfull accusation. There was amongst the Jews a sect of people that were called Pharisees, who were too much addicted to self opinion, and boasted themselves to be the exactest observers of the law in all the countrey, to whom these women were very much addicted, as to those who were much beloved of God, as as in outward appearance they made shew for. These were such as durst oppose themselves against Kings, full of fraud, arrogancy, and rebellion, presuming to raise war upon their motions, and to rebell and offend their Princes at their pleasures: whereas therefore all the nation of the Jews had sworn to be faithful to Cesar, and to the estate of the King; these onely refused to take oath, and of this sect there were to the number of 6000. For which cause the King having imposed an amercement upon them, Pheroras wife paid it for them, for which cause they pretending to gratifie her, and being esteemed for such as were skilfull in foretelling such things as were to come, by reason of their often communication with God, foretold her that God had decreed to bring the kingdom of Herod and his posteritie to an end, and would bring to passe that the crown should descend to Pheroras and his sons. Salome had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no lesse: and how they likewise corrupted every one of his Courtiers, for which cause he put those to death amongst the Pharisees, who were the principall authors of this advice, and with them also the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the goodliest men of that time. He afterwards cut off all those amongst his household servants, who were of the Pharisees faction: For Bagoas was bewitched with that hope by them, that he suffered himself to be called the father and benefactor of the King, who should be established according to their prediction, and have the government of all things, and should be strengthened by marriages, and descent of his lawfull and naturall children.

But after that Herod had punished those amongst the Pharisees, who were convicted to have been of the conspiracie, he assembled a councill of his friends, before whom he accused Pheroras wife, and ripped up the outrages that was done unto his daughters, as it hath been declared, ascribing the same to the pride of this woman, objecting it for a crime against her, for thereby she had injured his honour. Besides this, he accused her that she had of set purpose stird up mutinies, and by all means possible both in word and in effect, contrary to all law of nature, she stirred up debate betwixt him and his brother, and that the fine that he had imposed upon his adversaries, was satisfied at her charge: so that no jot of that conspiracie was contrived without her privitie and consent. For which causes (said he) brother Pheroras, it shall not be amisse for you of your own accord to drive such a wretched woman from you, before you be requested, and the sentence be pronounced against her, otherwise she will be the cause to kindle a warre betwixt you and me. For if at this present you will continue the friendship and brotherhood betwixt you and me, separate yourself from her: in so doing I will account you for my brother, and you shall lose nothing by the affection which

Now although Pheroras was moved with the importance and waight of this discourse; yet said he, that for the love he bare unto his wife, he would forget nothing of that duty which consanguinitie required at his hands in regard of his brother: but that he had rather die then live without her company, whom he loved more dearly then his life. Herod, although he took this answer of his brothers for a most grievous injurie, yet forbore he to discover his displeasure towards him: he onely forbade Antipater and his mother, and in like maner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. He commanded the women likewise that they should give over their familiar entertainments the one with the other, which all of them promised to performe. Yet this notwithstanding upon fit opportunities and occasions, they visited one another, and Antipater and Pheroras feasted one another by night. The report also went that Antipater had the company of Pheroras wife, and that his mother was the means and minister of their privie meetings.

ANTIPATER suspecting his fathers dislikes, and fearing lest his hatred should by increase bring him into hazard, he wrote unto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their letters unto Herod, requesting him to send Antipater unto Caesar, with all expedition as was possible. Which being brought to passe, Herod sent him thither with divers royall presents, and gave him his testament and will with him; wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdome to Antipater. And if it should happen that Antipater should die before him, then bequeathed he the same to his sonne Herod, whom he had by the high Priests daughter. About the same time Syllaus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithstanding he had neglected those things that Caesar had given him in charge. Him did Antipater accuse before Caesar, for the same defaults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllaus also was accused by Aretas, for murdering divers of the best account in the Citie of Petra, contrary to his minde: amongst the which was Sobennus (a man of much vertue and honour) and Phabatus, Caesars servant; of which crimes Syllaus was accused upon that occasion which ensueth: There was a certain man of Corinthus, who was one of the Kings guard, and such a one as he put very great trust in: him did Syllaus perswade by store of money and bribes, to kill Herod; which he promised to performe. Phabatus made privie to Syllaus minde, he presently told it to the King, who caused him to be apprehended and tortured; who confessed the whole matter. He laid hands also on two Arabians, perswaded by this Corinthians confession; one of which was a man of command in his countrey, and the other was Syllaus chiefe friend. They being examined, confessed that they came thither to sollicit and egge forward with many exhortations the Corinthian to execute the murder, and to assist him if he stood in need of them. Which being fully approved by Herod before Saturnine, he sent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded against, and so to be punished.

Pheroras in his

HEROD perceiving that his brother Pheroras did constantly continue his affection towards his wife, he commanded him to retire himself into his own dominion: whereupon he willingly departed to his Tetrarchy, protesting by many solemn oaths, that he would never more return into the Citie, unless he were assured that Herod was dead. Not long after it hapned, that the King falling sick, he was sent for to receive certain secret instructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his oath. This notwithstanding, Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his love and affection towards him: for he came unto Pheroras as soon as he heard of his first sicknesse, and being unwell for also; and after he was deceased, he sent his body to Jerusalem, and honourably intombed him in that place, and grievously lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipaters mis-haps, who at that time was departed to Rome. For it was Gods pleasure that at last he should be punished for the murder of his brethren. This matter will I discourse of at large, that it may serve for an example unto many Kings, how they ought to practise and follow vertue in all their actions.

PHERORAS wife is accused, and HEROD is advertised of ANTIPATERS conspiracies.

After Pheroras death, two of his freemen, who were Taphnites by birth, and such as Pheroras in his lifetime both inly trusted, and dearly loved, came unto Herod, requiring him not to suffer his brothers death to passe unpunished, but, to make diligent enquire of that unfortunate and unexpected misadventure. Herod lent a willing eare to their suite, perceiving that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible. Whereupon they told him, that Pheroras, the day before his unexpected sicknesse, had sup't with his wife, and that having received an unaccustomed poyson with his meat, he was dead. That this poison had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her speech protested that it was some potion to increase love, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongst all others are skilfull in poisons, and are great forcerers, and she that was charged with this fact, was esteemed a great friend and favourer of Syllanus best beloved. That Pheroras mother and his wives sister went into those quarters upon purpose to buy that poison, and returned back, and brought this woman with them the day before the supper. The King moved by these words of theirs, tortured both those maid-servants of theirs, who were there bondwomen, as also certain other of their free servants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reason that none of them confessed the same; at length, she that was last of all put to her triall, overcome by the pains she endured, said nought else, but that she prayed God that Antipaters mother might feel the like torments, sith she was the cause of all those mischiefes which they endured.

Herod tortureth the Ladies bondwo-
men, and soudeth out An-tipaters and their secrets.

These words of hers made Herod the more eager and inquisitive, so that by force of tortures he wrought out all the secrets of these women, their banquets, their secret assemblies, and those very words that Herod had spoken apart betwixt his son and himself, which had been reported unto the women that Pheroras entertained: namely, that he would give him one hundred talents, provided he would use no conference with Pheroras. Moreover, they reckoned up the hatred that Antipater bare unto his father, the complaints that he made unto his mother, of the too long life and continuance of his father: for that in regard of himselfe he was already waxen old; so that although the Kingdome should fall into his hands presently, yet could he receive but very little contentment thereby. Moreover he alleadged, that divers brothers and brothers children were brought up together with him, so that he might not securely hope for any thing, for that already if he should fortune to die, the Kingdome was to descend not to his sonne, but to his brother: besides this, he was accustomed to accuse the King of divers cruelties committed by him, and of that murder which he executed upon the persons of his children: That for fear lest he should practise his tyranny against those that remained, Antipater had found out the device to be summoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himself into his Tetrarchy.

These words, which as he knew had reference to that which his sister had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; so that being pressed with the malice of Antipater, he sequestred Doris his mother from his presence, spoiling her before her departure of all her jewels which were valued at many talents: and from that time forward he shewed himselfe more favourable towards those women of Pheroras household. But nothing did more whet Herods displeasure against Antipater, then did a certain Samaritan, who was also called Antipater, who had the ordering of the affairs of Antipater the Kings sonne. For he being brought in question and tortured, declared among other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortall poison, and delivered the same to Pheroras his uncle, commanding him to practise the kings death in his absence, and by that means least suspected. That this poyson was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipaters friend. That it was sent to Pheroras by one called Theodion, Antipaters mothers brother. That this poyson was kept by Pheroras wife, and was committed by her husband to her custody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confessed no lesse, and hastning forth as if she intended to fetch the same, she cast her selfe down headlong from the top of the house: yet did she not murder herselfe, because she fell upon her feet. Now after she was recovered out of her swoone, and the King had promised all securitie both to her self and her family, if so be she would discover the truth; and contrariwise threatened her with extreme torments, if she obstinately continued in concealing these treasons, she swore she would discover all things according as they were acted, and

and as many men thought at that time, she told nothing but the truth. That poyson (said she) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, and bought there by the means of a brother of his, who was a Physician. After this, Theudion brought it to our house: and I having received it from Pheroras hands, kept the same, but bought by your son Antipater to poyson you that are his father. Now therefore after that my husband fell sick, and you in kindnesse came to visit and comfort him, he being moved with compassion, and conquered by your brotherly kindnesse, by your good affection and loving care in giving order for his health, called me unto him, and said; O wife, Antipater hath circumvented me, whilest by his pestilent counsels and poysoning practices he desireth to cut off his father, and deprive me of a kinde brother. Now therefore, sith as I perceive there is no part of my brothers loving and naturall affection diminished towards me, wherewith he was wont to entertain me, and that my latestt<sup>H</sup> hour of life approacheth, God forbid, that being ready to sleepe with my forefathers, I should present them with a ghost soiled and sweltered in my brothers blood: Dispatch therefore, and burn this poyson before mine eyes. Hereupon said she, I presently brought it forth according as my husband commanded me, and burnt the greatest part of the poyson, and the rest I reserved, that if after my husbands death your Grace should use me unkindly, it might serve me to escape those extremities that would betide me.

The king putteth away his wife, & blots his sonour of his testament. He degradeth Simon, and enstateth Matthias in the Priesthood. Archelaus and Philip are accused by Antipaters means.

After she had spoken thus, she brought forth before them all the poyson, and the boxe wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antiphilus brothers, and the mother to them both, confessed no lesse, being constrained thereunto by force and violence of torture, and acknowledged the box. The Kings wife also, who was the daughter of the high Priest, was accused for confederacie and concealement of all these treasons. For which cause Herod put her away from him, and razed his sonnes name out of his testament, wherein he had bequeathed him the kingdome after his decease. He displaced also his father in law Simon the son of Boethus from the Priesthood, and placed Matthias the son of Theophilus, who was born in Jerusalem, in his stead. In the mean space Bathillus, Antipaters freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confessed that he brought a poyson with him to deliver it to Antipaters mother, and Pheroras, to the end that if the first poyson were not effectually enough to dispatch the King, they might make use of this other, to cut him off speedily. There came letters also to Herods hands from his friends in Rome, written and devised by Antipaters means, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, for very often they had refreshed the memory of Alexander and Aristobulus death, contrived by their father; and for that they lamented the miserable fate of them, who were innocently betrayed, and that now also they themselves were called back into their countrey for no other cause, but upon their arrivall to be made partakers of their brothers miserable destiny. These things did Antipaters friends certifie Herod of, in that by many and mighty presents he wrought them thereunto. He himself also wrote unto his father colourably, after a maner excusing the young men, and imputing their words to their indiscretion and young yeers. Mean-while, he busied himselfe in accusing Syllanus, and courted the chiefeest Romans, buying divers ornaments and jewels to present them with, to the value of two hundredth talents. And it is to be wondred at, that so great matters being brought on foot against him, seven moneths at least before his return into the countrey of Judæa, that no inkling thereof came unto his ears. But the cause partly was, the diligent search and watch that was kept upon the high waies, and partly the hatred that all men had conceived against Antipater. For there was not any that would put themselves in hazard to procure his securitie.

CHAP. VII.

ANTIPATER is condemned, and cast into prison.

Helio & Rufinus, chap. 6.
Herod writeth friendly letters to Antipater, and calleth him home from Rome.

HEROD concealing his displeasure, answered Antipater his sons letters (wherein he gave him to understand, that as soon as he had dispatched his affairs as it behoved him, he should return) charging him to hasten homeward, for fear least during his absence, some unexpected inconvenience might betide him. He likewise after a temperate maner, complained unto him of his mother, promising notwithstanding to remit the fault upon his return, and by all means he made shew unto him of much kindnesse, fearing lest he, apprehending any suspicion, should deferre to hasten his return homeward, and lingering too long at Rome, should contrive some traiterous stratageme, to the prejudice of himself, and the overthrow of his kingdome. These letters did Antipater receive in Cilicia, and already had he received others at Tarentum, by whom he understood, of Pheroras his uncles

A uncles death, whereat he was sore grieved; not for the love he bare to Pharaz, but for that he died before he had murdered his father, according as he had promised him. As soon as he came to Celenderis a City of Cilicia, he grew doubtfull whether he should return or no, and grievously was he distracted by his mothers disgraces, who was banished from the court. Sundry also were the opinions of his friends in this behalfe: for some of them counselled him to stay, and expect the event of these troubles in some place: other some, on the other side, advised him to delay no longer his return into his countrey, for that upon his arrivall he might easily satisfie all those objections and accusations that were enforced against him, because his accusers had nought else to strengthen their cause with, but his absence. This latter advice liked him best; so that he betook himself to sea, and at last arrived in the port of Sebastie, so called, and builded by Herod, to his great charge in honour of Caesar.

B And now already it manifestly appeared that Antipater was upon his downfall: For no man came out to salute him, no man entertained him, as they did upon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with prayers and happy acclamations: but contrariwise they boldly and openly spake against him, and bitterly cursed him, telling him that he was justly punished for the wickednesse he had committed against his brothers.

C About the same time Quintilius Varus, who was sent to succeed Saturnine in the government of Syria, was at Jerusalem, and drew thither at that instant upon Herods request, to assist him with his counsels in his present and weighty occasions. Now whilest these two sate and consulted together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and royaltie that he was accustomed to use, entered the Palace. The guard of the gates suffered him to enter in, but they excluded all those that were with him. This first of all affrighted and appauled his spirits, in that he already perceived into what calamitie he was fallen; and now also when he drew neer his father, he thrust him from him, accusing him of the murder of his brethren, and reproaching him with that intent he had to poyson him, telling him that the next day Varus should both heare and judge all his misdemeanours.

D He altogether amazed at the greatnesse of that unexpected mischiefe, which he both heard and saw, departed presently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his mother and his wife (which was Antigonus daughter, who had been King of the Jews before Herod) by whom he was advertised of all that which had hapned, and for that cause more diligently prepared himself for his triall. The next day Varus and Herod sate in judgement, accompanied by their friends on both sides; thither also were cited the Kings kinred and his sister Salome, and certain others, who could discover his secret practices; some of which had been torured, and namely Antipaters mothers servants, who a little before his arrivall, had been apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he should take heed that he returned not into the countrey, because his father was made privie to all his practices, and that for the present he had no other refuge but onely to Caesar, and to take care likewise lest he should fall into his fathers hands.

Hereupon Antipater humbling himself on his knees before the King his father, besought him not to condemn him before his cause were heard, but to suspend his judgement untill such time as he had heard his justifications. But Herod, after he had commanded him to withdraw himselfe into the midst of the court and assembly, deplored his infelicitie in begetting such children, and bewailed his mis-hap, that in his old age he was reserved for an Antipater. After this he reckoned up the cares he had spent in their education and institution, and how bountifully he had bestowed upon him as much riches as he required: he furthermore alleadged, that none of all these favours could preserve him from falling into the lapse of the losse of his life by their policy, to the intent that they might injuriously possesse the kingdome, before either the law of nature, or the will of their father, or their own rights could challenge the same. But above all the rest, he wondred at Antipater, with what hope he could possibly be puffed up to attempt so audacious and wicked an enterprize. For by his Testament he had made him the heir of his kingdome, and in his life time also had made him equall partaker of his dignitie, glory and power: that he received annually fifty talents of revenue, and to furnish his voyage for Rome, had three hundred talents given him. Moreover, he accused him for his slanderous accusations against his murdered and slaughtered brothers: who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? but if they were innocent, why without cause produced he his slanderous accusations against those, who were his naturall brethren? For in his own respect he had never found any thing against them, but by his report: neither had he given sentence against them, but by Antipaters advice, who for the present were absolved by him, because he was become the heir of their patricide. In uttering these words he began to weep, being unable to urge his griefes any further; for which cause he besought Nicholaus Damascene, who was his dear friend, and conversed ordinarily with him, and was privie to all that which had passed, to prosecute the rest that appertained to the inquest and approbation of his crime.

But Antipater turning himself towards his father, began to justifie himself, urging the same testimonies and favours that his father had shewed unto him, and the honours he had received at his hands, which he would never have shewed him, if he had been unworthy of the same, and had not by his vertue deserved these favours. He alleadged also, that by his vertue he had prevented all that which might have hapned, and that where the cause required his labour or diligence, he dispatched all things with his own industry, that it was unlikely that he, who had delivered his father from those treasons, which were intended against him by other men, should himself attempt the like: and as farre from probabilitie that he should goe about to extinguish that vertue (whereof even untill that day he had given testimony) to the end that alwaies hereafter he might be defamed for such an indignitie. For long before this time he was named and intituled to succeed him, and to enjoy those very honours whereof already he pertook no small part; whereby he protested that it was unlikely, that he, who might enjoy the halfe of all that his father had, in all securitie, vertue and honour, should desire the whole with infamy and danger; yea and with incertitude to obtain the same; considering in especiall, that the punishment which had befallen his brothers (whom he had both disclosed and accused at such time as they were hidden) was procured by him, who, if he had listd, might have concealed them in secret, and whose wickednesse toward their father (after it was approved) he himself had revenged upon them: neither (as he said) repented he himself of that which he had done: for that action of his might be an argument to approve how incorruptly he loved his father. And as touching that which he had dealt in at Rome, Cæsar himself was witnes thereof, who could be no more deceived then God himself: whereof those letters bore record, which were written by him, which in equity should be of no lesse force, then the slanders of those who sought to set them at oddes: the most part of which objections and reproaches had been comploted and devised by his enemies, who have had the leisure to pursue the same during his absence, which they could not have performed in his presence. Finally, he avowed, that all those confessions were false which were extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that such as are put to the triall, confesse many things by force of torment that are untrue, to satisfie them that put them thereto: briefly without all favor, he offered himself to the rack in justification of his innocency. Upon these his protestations, all the council and assistants were confounded. For all of them had great compassion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his tears; so that his very enemies began to pity him. And Herod himself made it appeare, that he seemed in some sort to be altered in his opinion: notwithstanding he endeavoured to conceale the same.

But Nicholaus, according as he was requested, prosecuted that accusation which the King had begun, urging all things to the uttermost, and producing all the witnesses, and those manifest proofes, that were gathered from their examinations that were tortured. In especiall, he amply discoursed of the Kings vertue, which he had fatherly expressed in the education and instruction of his children; for which he had been so unkindly and unnaturally required. Moreover, that his first childrens foolish rashnesse was not so much to be wondred at, for that being young, they had been corrupted by the malice of their counsellors, and had blotted out of their hearts all the laws of nature, rather through ambition of rule, then desire of riches: But that Antipaters boldnesse was both wonderfull and wicked, who more cruel then the cruellest beasts (who toward their benefactors acknowledge each good turn) was nothing mollified by his fathers so great indulgence; not terrified by his brothers calamitie, but must needs emulate them in their crueltie. And thou thy self (said he) O Antipater, wert the Judge of their attempted treasons, by thy inquisition they were indited, thou didst execute the justice against them being convicted. Neither doe we disallow that thou didst prosecute them with just indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitatest their intemperance: and we easily gather that those acts of thine were not attempted for thy fathers securitie, but intended for thy brothers overthrow, that by detesting their malice, thou mightest insinuate thy self into the allowance and good liking of their father and thine, that afterwards thou mightest more cunningly and securely bring him to his end, which at length thou hast attempted to perform. For whilest thou adjudgest thy guilty brothers to death, and sparest their confederates, thou makest it manifest in all mens eyes, that thou art in good liking with them, whose assistance thou mightest hereafter use in oppressing thy father.

Thou

A Thou hast therefore taken a double pleasure worthy thy maners, the one openly as if rejoycing and glorying, that by thy brothers death thou hast atchieved a matter of honour: the other secretly, with endeavouring by greater wickednesse, but more secret fraud, to make an end of thy father, the revenger of whose injuries thou pretendest to be. For if thou hadst truly detested their malice, thou hadst never esteemed the same to be worthy of thy imitation: For thou hadst not cut them off for committing such capitall offences, as were answerable unto thine, but for that they had a more just and rightfull title to succeed in the kingdome then thou hast. And thou hast thought good to mix the murder of thy father with the slaughtered bodies of thy brothers, for fear lest thou shouldest be suddenly convicted in thy conspiracies against them, and to the end that the punishment that thou well deserveest to suffer, should light upon thy unfortunate father, projecting with your self such a paricide, and so rare and hainous a murder, that to this day the like thereof hath not been heard of amongst men. For thou being his sonne hast practised these treasons, not onely against thy father, but against him that loved thee above measure, and did thee good beyond hope, with whom thou hast actuall participation of the government of the kingdome, and who had appointed thee his heire in the same, being no waies hindred, either for the present, or in times past, to participate the pleasure of soveraigntie, and being assured of the hope of succession both by the will and writings of thy father. But you have measured the course of your affairs, not according to Herods vertue, but according to your own appetite and malice, intending to deprive such a father of his part, who granted you the whole: and seeking in effect to murder him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from injurie. And not content of your self to practise these treacheries, you have poisoned your mother also with no lesse corruption, and in stead of love that should have been amongst brethren, you have filled your family with mutinies and hatreds: And after and besides all these things, thou hast been so audacious, as to call thy father beast, being of thy self more malignant then those beasts which are most venomous, using thine own venom against thy dearest friends, & such as have best deserved at thy hands, strengthening thy self with his guard, and divers treacheries both of men and women against one old man, as if thy cursed minde alone were not sufficient to satisfie thy hatred. And now after so many men and women, slaves and free-men tortured for thy cause, after the open and manifest testimonies of thy parties in the conspiracie, thou art so impudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedst to deprive thy father of his life, doest now as much as in thee lyeth, endeavour to abolish that law that was instituted against malefactors in thy kind, herewithall Varus equitie, and all whatsoever justice is in the world. Doest thou therefore accuse them of falsehood, who were examined in torments, to the end thou mightest endanger their credit, who were the preservers of thy fathers life? Shall we beleieve thee more then them in their torments? wilt thou not (O Varus) deliver the King from the injuries of those, who are his own flesh and blood? wilt thou not put this wicked beast to death, who hath murdered his brothers, to pretend a love towards his father, and who hath at last been discovered to be the most mortall enemy of them all, to the intent that at one instant he might establish the kingdome in himselfe? Thou knowest that Patricide is no private crime, but a publike injurie to life and nature, which is no lesse loathsome in the thought, then it is in the act: which whoso punisheth not, is of himselfe guilty of an injurie offered to our common mother nature.

After these speeches, he annexed certain points as touching Antipater mother, which through feminine frailty had been blabbed out by her, to wit, that she had asked counsell of soothsayers and diviners, to whom the kingdome should befall: and that she had offered sacrifices, and made prayers for the death of the King. And moreover, he declared what lascivious pranks Antipater had played with Pheroas women, in banquetting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewise that were presented by such as were tortured, with sundrie testimonies of divers men, some suborned, the other found out to be incontinently produced and confirmed. For each man seeing that Antipater was exposed to the accusations of those men, who had the government in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long time accompanied him, had openly delivered him into the hands of his enemies, they manifestly discovered the insatiable hatred which they had conceived against him, whereas beforetime the fear that they had of him inforced them to be silent: yet was he not so much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his own wickednesse, namely, his deadly hatred against his father, his breach of amitie amongst his brethren, whereby he filled the Kings household with seditions and murders, of some complotted, and acted by other some, neither giving place to hatred according to justice, nor to amitie according to good affection, affection, but according as it might stand with his profit. Which for that divers men perceived long before that time, they judged of events according as they had reason, and the rather because that being void of hatred, they spake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice against him, at such time as they were shut up; at this time when they were deprived of their fear, they declared all things, that they knew. And whereas there were divers produced of the mischiefs committed by him, yet seemed there nothing to be fained, for that the accusers neither spake in favour of the King, neither concealed any thing for fear of perill, but condemned all Antipater's wicked actions, and judged him worthy of death and punishment, not so much for his fathers securitie as of his own demerit. Neither did they onely accuse him, who were by justice tied thereunto, but divers voluntary witnesses also brought in their evidence, so that although he was a very cunning dissembler, and colourer of his lies, and most impudent in their assertions, yet durst he not once open his mouth or mutter against the same.

Varus giveth Antipater license so justifie himself. Antipater striketh by his protestations, and invocations of God to justifie himself.

As soon as Nicholas had finished his discourse and accusations, Varus commanded Antipater to answer to those crimes that were objected against him, if he had any thing to alledge, that he was not guilty of those forfeits or hainous crimes that were laid unto his charge. For of himselfe he desired nothing more, and knew well that Herod his father desired no lesse, then that he should justifie himselfe, and maintain his innocency. But he humbling himself upon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, besought God, who was the searcher of all hearts, to approve his innocencie by some eminent sign, how he had never attempted any thing to his fathers prejudice. For this is the custome of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hainous act, they engage themselves in all wickednesse, without any respect of Gods justice; & when as by their misdeeds, they are fallen into perill, then call they God to their mindes, by whose invocation and testimony they desire to be delivered, making a shew that they commit all things to his determination. The like whereof in this time hapned in Antipater: who, whereas beforetime he disposed all his actions in such sort, as if there had been no God that had the oversway of human affairs; at such time as justice overtook him, and he was disfurnished of the benefit of the law, had his recourse to Gods power, alledging that he was reserved by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his fathers safety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often questionings he could wrest nothing from him, but that he onely cried upon God, seeing that otherwise there would be no end of these debates, he commanded the poyson to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being presently brought unto him, and ministred to one that was condemned to die, it presently killed the man. Which done, he arose and departed out of the councill, & the next day went unto Antioch, where for the most part he was wont to have his residence, for that it was the chief city of the Assyrians. But Herod presently commanded his son to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talk had been between him and Varus upon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the King did nothing in imprisoning him, but by his counsell. When as therefore he had fast bound him, he sent unto Cesar, and wrote his letters unto him, as touching Antipater, sending certain appointed messengers, who by word of mouth might certifie him of his cursed treasons.

At the very same time there was a letter intercepted, sent by Antipater to Antipater, which Antipater remained in Egypt: which letter being opened by the King, was written to this effect: I have sent you Acme's letter, hazarding thereby mine own life: for you know that I am in danger of the displeasure of two mighty families, if I should be discovered. As for your self, bethink you well of your affairs in this respect. Such were the contents of this letter. The King made diligent search for others also, but he could finde none: for Antipater's servant, who had brought that which was read, denied that he had any other. But while the King was in this doubt, one of his servants and friends perceived that the inside of the messengers under-coat was newly sewed: for he had two garments the one upon the other: and conjecturing that the letters might be hid in the fould thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the same, and found them. The tenour whereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I have written the letters to your father, according as you gave me instructions, and I have counterfeited the copy of my letter, as if it had been sent by Salome my mistress. I assure my self, that when he hath read the same, he will punish Salome as one that hath practised treason against him. But that letter that was supposed to have been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipater's invention, and written in Salome's name, according to his invention, and in Acme's style. The contents were these: Acme to King Herod, Health: Whereas I have an especial

A care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy securitie, having found a letter of Salome written against thee unto my Lady, I have not without danger taken the copy thereof, and sent it unto you, in which she required that she might have licence to marry Sylleus. Teare this copy, lest through the knowledge of the same, I grow in danger of my life. Now in that which she had written to Antipater, she had discovered that she had written these words to Herod, according to that commandement he had given her, as if Salome had conspired to work some treason against him. She sent also the copy of those counterfeit letters in the name of Salome, and sent them unto her mistress with a reason.

This Acme was a Jew born, and chambermaid to Julia, Caesar's wife, and did that which is above written for the love which she bare to Antipater, whom he had hired by great sums of money, to the end, that she should assist him to execute the mischief, which he practised against his father and against his aunt. Herod made almost desperate by the great mischiefs of Antipater, was stirred up on the sudden to shorten his days, for that he was the onely means that stirred up these great tempests of sedition in his kingdome, and who not onely practised against his father and his aunt, but against his sister also, and had in like sort corrupted Caesar's family. Salome also incensed him the more, beating her breasts and offering her selfe to all deaths, if any such like matter might be duely proved against her. For which cause Herod sent for Antipater, commanding him to speak freely all that which he had to say without fear. But he having not one word to answer for his defence, Herod said unto him: Since that on all sides thou art convicted, and surprized in thy wickednesse, delay not, but discover those that are of thy confederacie. Whereupon he laid all the fault upon Antipater, and named none other. At that time Herod being wounded by extreme grief, would have sent Antipater to Rome unto Caesar, that he might receive his judgement from him, but afterwards he feared lest by the interest of his friends he should escape the danger, for which cause he kept him bound and fettered in prison, as he had done before: And in the mean while sent certain messengers with letters to Caesar, to accuse his son, and to declare wherein Acme had been his confederate, producing the copy of the letters. These Embassadors therefore resorted to Rome, instructed in those things they were to answer to those interrogatories that should be offered them, and with them he sent these letters.

HEROD'S sickness and the sedition amongst the Jews.

WHILE Herod fell sick, and made his will, and appointed his youngest son to succede him in the Kingdome, for that through Antipater's instigations he had conceived a hatred against Archelaus and Philip. He sent also 1000. talents unto Caesar, and 500. to his wife, and to his children, friends and freemen. He bestowed also money, rents, & lands upon his own children: he gave his sister Salome an ample possession, for that she had alwaies persevered in loving him, and had never offended him. And having lost all hope of recovery, for that he was about 70. years old, he became very tuchie and froward in whatsoever his affairs. The cause hereof was, that opinion he had conceived, that he waxed contemptible, and that the whole nation took pleasure in those mis-haps which befotuned him: which some of those who were favoured by the people, made him the rather believe upon this occasion which ensueth: Amongst those that were most learned amongst the Jews, Indus the son of Scariphan, and Matthias the son of Mar-galothus, the most excellent interpreters of the laws and ordinances of the countrey (and for this cause were in greatest estimation amongst the people, by reason that they instructed and trained up the youth, for all those that desired to obtain vertue, spent all their time with them) understanding that the Kings sickness was dangerous, they incensed the younger sort, counselling them to overthrow all those works that the King had caused to be made, contrary to the law and custome of the countrey, to the end, that they fighting for piety, might obtain the reward that attendeth the same. For in that the King had enterprized and done many things contrary to the law, divers unaccustomed miseries had befallen him, and namely that sickness where with he was detained. For Herod had done divers things contrary to the ancient law, against which Indus and Matthias exclaimed openly. For he had erected over the portall of the great Temple, an Eagle of gold of great value. Now the law prohibited that they, who pretend to live according to the same, should in any sort erect any image, or represent any figures of living creatures whatsoever. For this cause these doctors counselled them to pull down that Eagle: telling them, that although the matter seemed to want no perill, yet ought they rather to prefer an honest death before a pleasant life, if so be it be employed for the defence of their countrey laws and religion. For in so doing, they should obtain immortall praise for the present, and a memorable and eternall glory in time to come; neither that they should protract the execution thereof for fear of danger, since death was a thing that might not be avoided; so that since by the generall course of nature, they must needs die, it should become them bravely to forsake their lives with praise and honour in imbracing vertue. For to die in the execution of some noble exploit (which cannot be atchieved without hazard of danger) their children should be richly rewarded with the fruits thereof, and their other parents that should outlive them (of what sex soever) should reap the fruits of that glory which was honorably atchieved by them. In these or such like words encouraged they the young men.

About that time there was a rumour spread, that the King was dead, which gave very great furtherance to the Doctors resolution. For at high noon they went up into the temple, they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their axes, in the sight and assembly of a great number of people that were in the temple. Now when the tydings hereof came unto the ears of the Kings Captain, he fearing lest some further and more farall tumult might be raised, drew out a strong company of souldiers with him, to repulse those that were assembled to hew down the Eagle: and charging the rude and disarmed multitude, who were gathered together, he easily slew and dispersed the most; as for those fourty young men that valiantly addressed themselves to resist, he apprehended them, and with them the authours of sedition Judas and Mathias, who thought scorn to submit themselves, and led them to the King: who demanding of them how they durst deface the sacred image? they answered, that long before that time they had resolved it, and that now according as they had resolved, they had like valiant men performed the same. For we (said they) maintain the honour of God and the doctrine of our law, whereof we are disciples: neither ought you to admire that with contempt of your ordinances we have preferred the laws of our forefathers, which Moses hath left us in writing, according as he was suggested and taught them by God: neither do we refuse any death or punishment which thou shalt inflict upon us, being assured in our consciences, that we suffer not for our impiety, but piety sake. Thus spake they all of them, continuing the like constant boldnesse in their answers, as they had shewed in their actions, being also ready, constantly to endure any punishment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the King commanded them to be bound, and sent them to Jericho: then calling before him those principall Jews, who had the government under him; and being brought into their assembly upon his pallat, by reason of his weaknesse, he recited unto them the numberlesse travels he had endured for their sakes: in like manner, how upon his great charges he had repaired and reedified the Temple: whereas the Asmonians for the space of 137 years wherein they reigned, could not perform such a building in the honour of God. Moreover, he signified unto them, how he had adorned the same with precious gifts, for which he hoped that after his death his memory and glory should survive. After this, he expostulated with them for what cause they obtained not from offering him that outrage during his lifetime? And why at noon daies and in the sight of all the people, they had laid hands on those presents which he had dedicated unto God, and had taken those things away violently which though in words they appertained to him, yet in the effect if the act were well examined, they had taken from God. The Governours suspecting his crafty, and fearing lest his unbridled passion should urge him further, by which means they might be assured of some severe punishment, answered him: that those things were not done by their consents, and that in their opinion the injurie ought not to be let slip without punishment. At that time Herod shewed himself more favourable towards the rest, but he caused Mathias to be deprived of the Priesthood, as one in part who had been the cause of that which had happened, and in his place substituted Isaac one of his wives brethren. During the Priesthood of this Mathias it happened also, that another high Priest was elected that very day, wherein the Jews did usually celebrate their fast. For Mathias the night before the day of the fast, seemed in his dream to have had the company of his wife; and whereas for this cause he was wont to offer the divine sacrifice, he had Joseph the sonne of Ellemus, appointed him to be his assister and substitute, by reason of his alliance. Herod therefore deposed Mathias, and as touching the other Mathias, who had moved this trouble, both he and his companions were by his commandement consumed with fire.

This very night the moon was eclipsed, and Herod sicknesse grew more vehement. For God punished those finnes which he had committed. For he was inflamed with a lent or slow fire, which to the outward sense seemed not so vehement, but inwardly leached & afflicted all his entrails: he had also a ravenous and unnaturall appetite to his meat, which might no waies be satisfied. Besides that, he had an ulcer in his bowels with a strange and furious colick. His feet were swoln with moist and shining flegme, and his stomach was no lesse affected also. His members rotted and were full of crawling worms, with a filthy and no lesse troublesome Priapisme, accompanied with an intolerable stench: besides all this, he had a strong convulsion of his nerves, and shortnesse of breath. For which cause it was a generall opinion amongst holy men, and such as had the knowledge of propheticie, that the King was thus punished for his infinite impieties and sinnes committed against the Majestie of God. And although he was tormented with an unsupportable sicknesse, yet had he hope to escape: and for that cause he sent for Physicians from all places, and refused none of those remedies which they thought behovefull for him. He therefore past over Jordan and went into the hot bathes of Calliroes, the waters whereof are potable, besides other vertues they have against all other kinde of sicknesse: this water dischargeth it self into the lake called Asphaltite. Being there, it was thought good by his Physicians, that he should refresh himself in those waters: There being set by them into a bathing tub filled with oyle, he waxed so sick, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his household servants wept and grievously lamented; and all his familiar friends cried out and bewailing him, with their great noise caused him to come to himself: and seeing himself wholly out of hope to escape, he gave order that there should a distribution be made to every souldier the summe of fifty drachmes, and he offered great presents to their Captains and his friends. Afterwards he returned to Jericho, where a melancholy humour possessed him, which made him unsociable, and displeased against all men; so that seeing that he must needs die, he bethought him of this facinorouse action that followeth. For the noblest men amongst the nation of the Jews, resorting unto him from all parts (upon his commandement under the expresse penaltie of losse of life, to whosoever should neglect the same) the King shewed himself to be displeased, as well against those whom he thought guilty, as against them who had given him no occasion of discontent. For he caused them to be shut up in a place called the Hippodrome; which was the tilt-yard to runne horses in, and sent for his sister Salome, & Alexas her husband, telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefes did incessantly torment him: which as he said, he ought to bear patiently, because it was an end that should happen to all men. But that which most grieved him was, that he saw himself deprived of those mournings and lamentations, which a King deserved. For he was not to seek of the Jews affections, neither how his death was desired and longed for by them, since that in his life time they presumed so farre as to revolt, and dishonour and deface those gifts, which he had bestowed upon the Commonweal. It therefore behoved them to afford him some solace in that his bitter anguish, for that if they refused not to performe that which he had contrived in his minde, the lamentation of his death should be magnificent, and as great as any King ever had: and the pleasure and laughter that might accompany his death should be abated by their sorrow, who should unfainedly lament for the whole nation. He therefore willed them, that at such time as he should give up the ghost, they should cause the Hippodrome to be invironed by his souldiers, as yet unadvertised of his death (which he would not have published before this execution were ended) and to command them to shoot their arrows at those that were shut up therein. And that when they had slain them all after this maner, they should make him triumph and rejoyce in a double joy; first, for that in his death his commandement should be ratified by effect: secondly, for that he should be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he besought his kinsfolk for the love they bare unto him, and for the faith they bare unto God, that they should not suffer him to die frustrate of this last honour: and they protested that they would not transgresse any point of this his commandement. Hereby a man may conjecture what his nature was, who took pleasure in these above-named impieties, and who through the desire he had of long life, hath after this sort dealt with those of his bloud: and it may be conjectured by these his last commandements, that he had nothing in him that favoured any humanitie: for that departing out of the world, he had such a minde, that all the nation and all such as were most affectionate towards him, should be driven to sorrow and desolation, commanding that in every house one should be slain, yea such as had not in any sort offended him, and were not accused of any misdeed committed against any other: whereas they that have any vertue, finding themselves at that state, have been accustomed to lay aside the hatred which they have before time borne unto their enemies.

ANTIPATERS DEATH.

While he delivered these instructions to his kindred, he received letters from those Embassadors which he had sent from Rome unto Cæsar: the effect whereof was, that Acme was put to death by Cæsars command, who was displeased with her for that she had been of Antipaters conspiracy, who was remitted to Herods pleasure like a King and father to use him, as best pleased him; either to exile and banish him; or if it so pleased him, to put him to death. Herod receiving these news, recovered his spirits a little through the pleasure he received in the contents of those letters, both of Acmes death, as of the power that was granted him to punish his son. But being assailed afresh with grievous dolours, and urged with a desire to eat, he called for an apple and a knife: for before-time he was accustomed to pare his apples himself, and to cut a little, and afterwards to eat it: when as therefore he had gotten hold of the knife, he looked round about him, determining to give himself a mortall wound therewith, and had surely done it, had not Achiab his nephew hastily stept within him, and staid his hand, and called for assistance. At that time the sorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the Palace, as if the King had been already dead: and Antipater certainly beleaving that his father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no lesse in his words) that being delivered out of prison, he should obtain the possession of the kingdome without any difficultie: and devised with the Jaylor as touching his deliverance, offering him great presents both in hand and hereafter, as if there had been no other question but of that. But so farre was the Jaylor from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that he went and certified the King what his intent was, and what offers he made him. Herod, who had already conceived a sinister opinion of his sonne, hearing what the Jaylor had said, began to exclaime, and to beat his head, although he was at the uttermost gaspe: and lifting himself up upon his elbows, he commanded that one of his guard should presently haste and kill him; and that done, he should be buried in the Castle of Hircanion without any honour.

CHAP. X.

HERODS WILL, DEATH, AND BURIALL.

After this, having changed his minde, he made a new Testament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and of Peræa, whereas before that he had instituted him for his successor in the Kingdome. He created Archelaus King; he gave the Provinces of Canlonites, Trachonites, Batanea and Paneade to Philip his sonne, and Archelaus brother by the mothers side, to be Tetrarch over those places. He gave his sister Salome Iannæa, Azor and Phaselis, with fifty thousand crowns of gold. He provided also for his other kinsmen, all whom he left rich in money, which he gave them, and renews which he assigned them. He gave Cæsar ten millions of drachmes in silver, amounting to the summe of eleven hundred thousand francs, besides a great quantity of gold & silver plate, and of precious moveables. To Julia Cæsars wife, and to certain others, he bequeathed five millions of drachmes, amounting to five hundred thousand francs, or thereabout. After he had in this manner disposed all things, some five daies after he had caused Antipater to be executed, he departed this life: having reigned after Antignus death, for the space of thirty and foure years, and thirty and seven years after he was elected and approved King by the Romans: a man without respect cruel, and severe towards all men; slave to his wrath; Lord of the lawes: yet so favoured by fortune, as no man more, for from a private man he became a King, and being environed with many perils, he alwaies happily escaped, and he lived also a very long time. And as touching his family and children, in this also in his own opinion was he happy, in that he overcame his enemies and adversaries: but in my opinion, he was most unfortunate.

But before the Kings death was thorowly known, Salome and Alexas discharged those that were locked up in the Hippodrome, and sent every one of them home unto his own house, telling them that the King commanded them to depart and follow their household affairs, and till their land: wherein they performed a most noble action, and benefited the whole nation with an especiall good turn. After the Kings death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas caused all the men of warge to be assembled in the Amphitheater in Jericho, and first

A first of all they caused Herods letters to be read, which were addressed to the souldiers, in which he gave them thanks for the fidelity and good will which they had expressed towards him, praying them to continue the same to Archelaus his sonne, whom he had appointed to be their King after him. That done, Ptolemeus, to whom the King had committed the custody of his seal, recited his testament, which was to take no effect, except that Caesar approved the same. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their king. The men of warre flocked about him in troops, accompanied with their Captains, promising him to serve him with no lesse will and affection, then they had done his father, praying God to yeeld him his assistance.

At that time also the Kings hearse was prepared, and Archelaus gave order that his obsequies should be most royally performed, and bestowed all the furniture that was requisite for that funerall and princely interment. He was carried out in a gilded litter, distinguished with divers precious stones, the cover thereof was of azure colour. The dead body was apparelled in a purple raiment, having a Diadem upon his head, over which there was set a crown of gold, and a scepter was couched in his right hand. About this litter marched a great number of his children and kinsfolk, and after them followed the men of warre, disposed in bands and troops, according to the manners of every nation. The first of these were the Archers of his guard: after them went the Thracians: and lastly, marched the Germans, and Galatians, all of them in their warlike habiliments and discipline. After them followed all the army, marching in order in like manner as when they were addressed to battell, each one under his Corporall and Captain. Next these followed five hundred of his household servants, bearing perfumes, and all these in this equipage marched to the castle Herodion, distant some eight stades or furlongs off. For there was he intombed, according to the tenour of his testament. Thus died Herod. Archelaus continued his mourning for seven dayes space in honour of his father. (For the law of the country ordaineth no lesse.) And after he had feasted the people, and laid aside his mourning apparell, he ascended up into the Temple. All the way as he went, all the people with shouts and acclamations, cried, God save the King, and with praises and praises honoured him to their uttermost, and he being conducted up to a high station and state, which was made for the purpose, and placed in a throne that was embellished with gold, entertained the people very graciously, taking pleasure in their acclamations and congratulations that they bestowed upon him. He gave them thanks also, for that they had blotted out of their remembrance the injuries that his father had done unto them; protesting in his own behalf, that he would enforce himself to requite their kindnesse, with an intire affection. He likewise told them, that for the present he accepted not the stile of King, because the honour was bequeathed him with this condition, that Caesar should ratifie his fathers testament. For this cause, although the souldiers that were in Jericho enforced themselves to set the Diadem upon his head, yet would he not accept that uncertain honour, because it was not resolved whether Caesar, who was the principall party in the gift, would grant him the government or no.

He alledged likewise, that if his affairs succeeded according to his desire, he would not, according as his honour commanded him, forget their love, or leave their good affection unrequited. And that in the mean-while, he would enforce himself by all means to further those things that concerned them, and entertain them with more kindnesse then his father had done. But they, according as it is the custome of the common people, thinking that those that enter into such dignities, declare and open their minds at the first day, the more Archelaus spake kindly and courteously unto them, the more they applauded him, and presented him with divers petitions, for certain grants and donations from him. Some of them cried out unto him, that he should cut off some part of their taxes and tallages, which they paid annually: Othersome cried upon him, to deliver those prisoners that were committed by Herod, of whom divers had pined a long time in prison: Others instantly urged him to cut off those tributes which had been imposed by him upon bargains and sales, which was to pay the half of the bargain. Whereunto Archelaus did not in any sort contradict, striving to the uttermost of his power to please the people, for that he knew full well that their good affection would be no small advantage toward him in the confirmation of his kingdome. That done, he sacrificed unto God, and afterward fell to banquetting and entertainment of his friends.

CHAP. XL

The people mutine against ARCHELAUS.

MEan-while, certain men among the Jews that were desirous of innovation, in their private conventicles bewailed Matthias and his confederates, whom Herod had put to death, and condemned for razing and defacing the golden Eagle: for that incontinently after their decease, they had neither been publicly honoured, nor lamented for, by reason of the fear that the people had conceived of Herod. For which cause at that time they required with lamentations and great cries, that their obsequies might be solemnized; and as if the dead bodies had received some contentation by their tears and tempest of exclaims, they uttered many hainous and disgracefull speeches against Herod; and assembling themselves together, they required Archelaus to do them justice against those, that during Herods life were in authoritie, and especially they demanded, that the high Priest, who was advanced by his father, should be deposed, and that another more lawfull and upright might be placed in his stead, to offer and exercise the high Priests place. Now, though Archelaus was sore displeased at these their violent proceedings, yet notwithstanding, he conformed himself to their good likings, in that he was with all expedition to repair unto Rome, to understand and attend Casars pleasure. He therefore called for the Generall of his army, willing him to perswade them not to seek a revenge for those men, who were dead, notwithstanding they were their friends, because whatsoever was done, was done according to law; and that no inquiry might be made thereof, except to the great prejudice of his reputation, and hazard of his state, in regard of the uncertaintie of the time: that it was more expedient for him to study for the maintenance of peace, untill such time as being established in the kingdome by Casars consent, he should return back again unto them, and that then he would consult with them for the common profit, according to their just demands, wishing them for the present to contain themselves, and to take heed lest they stirred up sedition.

When he had thus instructed his Generall, he sent him unto them. But they cried out with a loud voice, and would not suffer him to speak: but for fear of danger and death, they put him to silence. And if any other were so forward as to speak unto them, and perswade them to some moderation, and to alter their sinister resolutions, he was also in danger: for that they had this perswasion, that all things ought rather to be ordred according to their pleasures, then by the authoritie of their superiours: supposing that although during Herods lifetime they had been deprived of their dearest friends, it should be now a matter unworthie their courages, after his death to be cut off from their priviledge to demand their revenge. For they were transported with their own opinions, and held all that for lawfull and upright, which was in any sort conformable to their pleasures, without foreseeing the danger that might happen thereby: so much were they pleased to be revenged on those, whom they reputed to be their enemies. Now, whereas divers were sent by Archelaus, to consult with them, and divers came unto them, not as messengers from him, but as friends and lovers of peace, of their own motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to speak, and through their rage there arose a great tumult, which had grown to a further extremitie, if a greater number of people had joyned themselves with them.

At that time fell the feast of unleavened bread, which is called Pascha, which is a memoriall of their deliverance out of Egypt, at which time all men do most willingly present their sacrifices, and a greater number of beasts are slain at that feast, then at any other time. To this solemnitie also an infinite number of people assembled from all parts, to honour God: whereby the seditious (supposing that they had gotten fit opportunitie) lamented Indas and Matthias, who were the Expositors of the Law, and kept themselves within the Temple, whither they had gathered good store of victuals, which they were not ashamed impudently to beg for. But Archelaus, fearing lest their rage should produce some more grievous effect of mischief, sent out a band of armed men, with a Captain, and a Regiment of a thousand men, to repress their head-long furie, before the rest of the people were infected with their follies, and to bring them likewise unto him, whom they found to be the forwardest in that commotion. Against those the seditious cried out, with great clamours, and incensed the people against them, so that all of them rushed in upon the men of warre, and slew divers of them. The rest of them escaped with their Captain, yet not without divers wounds. That done, they which were within the Temple, returned again to their divine service.

Now

A Now Archelaus supposing that his whole fortune was endangered, except he repressed the rage of the multitude, he sent out all his footmen with a certain number of horsemen, to prevent lest they that were without should yeeld assistance to those, who had taken up their lodging in the Temple, and to put those to the sword, who having escaped the violence of the footmen, supposed themselves to be in securitie. These horsemen slew about three thousand men, the rest retired themselves into the mountains that were neer adjoyning. Hereupon Archelaus made proclamation, that each one should repair unto his own house. For which cause they departed and abandoned the feast, for fear of greater mischief, notwithstanding they had spleen enough, as it is the ordinarie custome of the ignorant multitude.

B After this, Archelaus accompanied with his mother, betook himself to sea, and led with him Nicholas and Ptolomey, with divers other his friends, committing the government of all his household and kingdome to his brother Philip: with him also departed Salome Herods sister, leading with her her children. There went also divers other of his kindred, who said that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the kingdome, but in effect it was to contradict him with all his power: and in especiall, to urge that against him with great vehemency, that was done in the Temple. Sabinus, Casars Viceroy in Syria, posting into Jewry to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Cæsarea. But Varus arriving in the mean-while, detained him from finishing that voyage; for Archelaus had sent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to do Varus a pleasure, would not seize the fortresse of Jewry, neither sealed up Herods treasures, but left them in Archelaus possession, untill such time as Cæsar had given order for the estate; and after he had made this promise, he stayed in Cæsarea.

al. 14.

C After Archelaus had set sail towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch, Sabinus went to Jerusalem, where he seized the Kings palace: and calling before him the Kings Agents, and the Captains of his garrisons, he required them to deliver up their Castles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the possession in their accustomed manner, according to the Kings direction, pretending to keep the same in Cæsars behalf. At the same time, Antipas Herods sonne travelled to Rome likewise, under the hope to be elected King, in regard of Salomes promises; and for that he better deserved the same then Archelaus, considering that in the first testament, which should be of more force then the later, he had been appointed King. He led his mother also with him, and Ptolomey the brother of Nicholas, who had been one of Herods most esteemed friends, and was well affected to further and set forward his title. But especially he was stirred up to seek the kingdome by Ireneus, a man very eloquent, and to whose charge in regard of his sufficiency, the affairs of the kingdome had been committed. For which cause, although he were perswaded to give over the kingdome unto his elder brother, who was confirmed in the kingdome by his fathers testament, yet would he not give ease thereunto. But Antipas no sooner arrived in Rome, but all kinsfolk revolted from Archelaus, unto him, not so much for the love they bare him, as for hatred they had conceived against Archelaus: and above all, for the desire they had to recover their liberty, and to draw themselves under a Roman Government. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeavoured to procure the royalty, should be more profitable unto them then Archelaus. Sabinus also by his letters accused Archelaus to Cæsar: but Archelaus by Ptolomey exhibited unto Cæsar a supplication containing his right and title to the kingdome, his fathers testaments, and the account of the money which Herod his father had sealed up, together with his ring, and expected the issue.

Sabinus repairth to Jerusalem, with an intent to seize Herods treasures and castles.
Antipas under hope to recover the kingdome, sailth to Rome.

But when he had read these letters, and those which Varus and Sabinus had sent him, and understood what summes of money he had left, and what the annuall revenue was, and how Antipas challenged the kingdome, and appropriated it to himself, according as his letters made mention: he assembled all his friends to have their advice thereupon. Amongst them was Caius the sonne of Agrippa and his daughter Julia, adopted by him, whom he caused to sit in the chiefest place: which done, he commanded the assistants to speak what they would touching this matter. At that Antipater Salomes sonne, a man very eloquent, and a great adversary to Archelaus, spake first, saying, That it was a mockery for him at that time to speak of the kingdome, considering that before Cæsar had granted it him, he had already seized the forces of the state, when at upon a festivall day he had slain so many: who although they had deserved sharp punishment, yet ought the justice thereof to have been reserved to a lawfull power, and not to have been usurped by him, either being King with Cæsar, prejudice, whose authority he had contemned; or by being a private man, which was a greater over-

B After this, Archelaus accompanied with his mother, betook himself to sea, and led with him Nicholas and Ptolomey, with divers other his friends, committing the government of all his household and kingdome to his brother Philip: with him also departed Salome Herods sister, leading with her her children. There went also divers other of his kindred, who said that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the kingdome, but in effect it was to contradict him with all his power: and in especiall, to urge that against him with great vehemency, that was done in the Temple. Sabinus, Casars Viceroy in Syria, posting into Jewry to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Cæsarea. But Varus arriving in the mean-while, detained him from finishing that voyage; for Archelaus had sent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to do Varus a pleasure, would not seize the fortresse of Jewry, neither sealed up Herods treasures, but left them in Archelaus possession, untill such time as Cæsar had given order for the estate; and after he had made this promise, he stayed in Cæsarea.

C After Archelaus had set sail towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch, Sabinus went to Jerusalem, where he seized the Kings palace: and calling before him the Kings Agents, and the Captains of his garrisons, he required them to deliver up their Castles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the possession in their accustomed maner, according to the Kings direction, pretending to keep the same in Cæsars behalf. At the same time, Antipas Herods sonne travelled to Rome likewise, under the hope to be elected King, in regard of Salomes promises; and for that he better deserved the same then Archelaus, considering that in the first testament, which should be of more force then the later, he had been appointed King. He led his mother also with him, and Ptolomey the brother of Nicholas, who had been one of Herods most esteemed friends, and was well affected to further and set forward his title. But especially he was stirred up to seek the kingdome by Irenæus, a man very eloquent, and to whose charge in regard of his sufficiency, the affairs of the kingdome had been committed. For which cause, although he were persuaded to give over the kingdome unto his elder brother, who was confirmed in the kingdome by his fathers testament, yet would he not give ease thereunto. But Antipas no soone arrived in Rome, but all kinsfolk revolted from Archelaus, unto him, not so much for the love they bare him, as for hatred they had conceived against Archelaus: and above all, for the desire they had to recover their liberty, and to draw themselves under a Roman Government. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeavoured to procure the royalty, should be more profitable unto them then Archelaus. Sabinus also by his letters accused Archelaus to Cæsar: but Archelaus by Ptolomey exhibited unto Cæsar a supplication containing his right and title to the kingdome, his fathers testaments, and the account of the money which Herod his father had sealed up, together with his ring, and expected the issue.

But when he had read these letters, and those which Varus and Sabinus had sent him, and understood what summes of money he had left, and what the annuall revenue was, and how Antipas challenged the kingdome, and appropriated it to himself, according as his letters made mention: he assembled all his friends to have their advice thereupon. Amongst them was Caius the sonne of Agrippa and his daughter Iulia, adopted by him, whom he called to sit in the chiefest place: which done, he commanded the assistants to speak what they would touching this matter. At that Antipater Salomes sonne, a man very eloquent, and a great adversary to Archelaus, spake first, saying, That it was a mockery for him at that time to speak of the kingdome, considering that before Cæsar had granted it him, he had already seized the forces of the state, when as upon a festivall day he had slain so many: who although they had deserved that punishment, yet ought the justice thereof to have been reserved to a lawfull power, and not to have been usurped by him, either being King with Cæsars prejudice, whose authority he had contemned, or by being a private man, which was a greater over-fight. For which cause he undeservedly at this time hoped for his approbation, whom already as much as in him lay, he had deprived of the title and authority of his allowance. Moreover, he objected against him, that of his own authority he had changed certain chieftains of the army, and that he had seated himself in the royall throne, and like a King had determined certain causes, and had granted certain demands of the people: finally, that he had left nothing undone, which he might have performed, had Cæsar confirmed his title. He alledged also, that they who were inclosed in the Hippodrome, were dismissed by him, and divers other acts, partly true, partly probable in regard of the ambition of young men, who desirous to govern, do ordinarily commit such things: besides this, his neglect in mourning for his father, and withall, his rare banquets all night long at that very time his father died, whereat the people began to mutine, seeing the small regard he had of his fathers death, from whom he had received so great goods and honors. How all the day long he made a shew of his sorrow and tears in his pavillion, but all the night took pleasures like a King; and being such, if Cæsar should grant him the kingdome, he would behave himself no lesse unkindly towards him, then he had done towards his most kinde father. That it was no lesse then a heinous crime in him, to delight himself with songs and dances at his fathers death, as if he had been his enemy: That he now came to Cæsars presence, to the intent to obtain the kingdome by his consent, whereas already he had behaved himself no otherwise then if he had already been established King by his authority. But most of all he exaggerated the slaughter he had committed in the Temple, and the impiety perpetrated so neer to the feast of Easter, at which time divers both strangers and citizens had been slaughtered after the maner of sacrifices, and the Temple filled with carcasses, not by a stranger, but by him, who under the colour of religion desireth the government of the kingdome, to the end he might satisfy the injustice of his nature, in exercising each way his tyranny towards all men: for which cause his father never thought, nor ever dreamt to substitute him King in his place. For he knew both his life and disposition, and by his former testament (and that of greatest force) had ordained his adversary Antipater to be King. For he had been allotted the kingdome by his father, not when his minde was dead before his body, but when both his judgement was sound, and his body in health. Yea although at that time Archelaus father had such a conceit of him, as in his later testament and bequest he pretendeth; yet that he had already declared what kinde of King he was like to be, who contemned Cæsars authority in confirming the kingdome, and being as yet a private man, doubted not to murder the citizens in the Temple. This said, Antipater (to give greater credit to his words, bringing divers of his kindred as witnesses of that he had said) ended his Oration.

Nicholas excuseth Archelaus.

Whereupon Nicholas arose, and alledged in Archelaus behalfe touching the slaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be restrained from their tumults and uprores, before Archelaus was enforced to appease them by force; alledging that they were so much the more guilty, for that they had not onely exercised their malice, but also had enforced others to attempt so hainous a revenge against them: for their insolency seemed in appearance to concern Archelaus, yet in a sort their contumacy pertained to Cæsars ruin. For those that had been sent by him to appease and redresse their sedition, were against all law and right charged and slain by them, without respect of God, or regard of the soleme feast: whose defence Antipater was not ashamed of, without respect of equity, so that he might satisfy that hatred which he bare unto Archelaus. That therefore it was their fault, who first of all abstained not from injury, but whetted those swords, which were drawn in maintenance of the peace, against their own bosomes. He enforced all other things also, whereof they had accused Archelaus, against themselves, saying that none of these things were done without their consents: and that the offence was not so grievous, as they intended it should be effected, to the end they might discredit Archelaus. So great a desire was in them to hurt their kinsman, a man both well respected, and affected by his father, as also kinde and officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the testament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect estate of minde and body, and of greater force then the former, because the authority and confirmation thereof was ascribed to Cæsar the Sovereigne of the world. Further, that Cæsar would not imitate them in that wrong they did unto Herod, who (being during his life-time bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death go about to violate his last and truest testament: but that rather like a friend and confederate he would confirm his will, who like his faithfull and sworn welwiller had committed all things to his trust. For that there must needs be a great difference between their malice and Cæsars vertue and faith, which was renowned thorow the whole world. For which cause he would not

A not judge his decree to be inconsiderately past, who left his succession to his well-deserving sonne, and referred all things to his trust. For that it was unlikely that he should erre in the choice of his successor, who had so discreetly submitted all things to Casars judgement. After this manner Nicholas also finished his discourse. Hereupon Cesar courteously raised Archelau, who lay prostrate and humbled before his feet, telling him that he was most worthy to be King, by giving an apparant testimonie, that he was constant in his resolutions; pretending that he would do nothing but that which should be answerable to Herods testament, and Archelau profit; and seeing the young man was confirmed in some good hope with this his promise, he determined nothing more for that time: but dismissing the counsell, he debated with himself, whether he should ratifie the kingdom to Archelau onely, or divide it amongst Herods kindred, especially since all men had need of his assistance.

CHAP. XII.

The Jews mutiny against Sabinus, and how Varus punisheth the authors of the sedition.

BUT before Cesar had determined any thing certainly in this behalf, Marthalce Archelau mother died of a sicknes, and Varus the President of the Jews in Syria, had sent letters, which certified the Emperour of the rebellion of the Jews. For after Archelau departure, all the nation were in an uprore. To pacifie which, Varus resorted thither, and punished the authors of the same: and after he had in this sort appeased all things, he returned to Antioch, leaving a regiment of souldiers in Jerusalem to restrain the factious innovations amongst the Jews: yet prevailed he nothing by this his policie. For as soon as Varus was departed, Sabinus, who intended Casars affairs, remaining in that place, grievously burthened the Jews, trusting to that power that was left him, and supposing that he was already enabled to withstand the multitude. For he armed divers souldiers, and made use of them to oppress the Jews, and to provoke them to sedition. For he inforced himself to surprize their fortresses, and forcibly to make search after the Kings treasures, for his private lucre and covetousnesse sake. When as therefore the feast of Whitsontide was come (which is one of our festivals) divers thousands from all parts repaired to Jerusalem, not onely for religion sake, but also for despite and hatred they had conceived against those violences and injuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not onely were those of Judæa grievously offended (but divers also resorted out of Galilee and Idumæa, from Jericho and the cities situate on the other side of Jordan, desiring all of them to be revenged on Sabinus. And dividing their camp into three bands after this manner, and one part of them took up the Hippodrome, and of the other two the one seized the southern quarter of the Temple, and the other the Eastern, and the third which was in the Hippodrome, were planted to the westward, where the Kings Palace stood; and thus prepared they all things that were necessarie to set upon the Romans whom they had besieged on all sides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number, and resolution, who were resolved either to die or to overcome, sent present letters unto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to send him a supply, because the regiment that was left by him, was in great danger; and must needs utterly perish without his speedy rescous: as for himself he withdrew into the tower and dungeon of the castle Phasaelus, which was a fortress which was builded and so called in honour of Herods brother, who was slain by the Parthians; and from the top thereof made a signe to the Romans, that they should fall upon the Jews; being afraid to trust himself to his own friends, and supposing that the rest ought to expose their lives to danger in maintenance of his safety. The Romans having made this fallie, there arose a desperate skirmish, wherein the Romans divers wayes had the upper hand; yet were nor the Jews any wayes discomfited; notwithstanding they had lost many men, but wheeled about so long, till at last they seized the outward galleries, and those that encompassed the Temple, and in that place there was a hot assault: for they slung down stones with their hands and slings, and there were certain archers mixed amongst them, who in that they had recovered a place of advantage, grievously gailed the Romans which were below, in that they had no means to avoid their shot, but were in such sort exposed thereunto, as their enemies had the better. And with this disadvantage fought the Romans a long time, till at length fore aggrieved at this their present indignitie, they secretly fired the galleries and porches, without any discoverie of those that were therein: which fire brought thither by many, and fed with such matter, as would speedily flame, incontinently took hold of the roof, because the roof was covered with pitch and wax, and gilded upon the wax, so that these great and excellent buildings were burnt down to nothing in a moment, and they that were resorted thither, were all of them consumed before they were aware. some of them fell with the roof of the galleries, other some shot at and slain by those that stood round about; other some despairing of their lives, and amazed at the mischief, either cast themselves into the fire, or slew themselves with their own swords, and all those that retired under hope to save themselves by that way they ascended, were encountered by the Romans, who slew them all in that they were discouraged and disarmed, though furiously desperate: so that not one of them that ascended the porches escaped with life. Afterward, the Romans thrusting forward one another by those wayes, where the fire was flaked, entered the treasure house where the sacred money was kept, by which means a great part thereof was stolne away by the souldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledge carried away four hundred talents. But the Jews being afflicted with a double calamitie, first of all with the losse of their friends in that fight: and lastly, with the spoil of the treasury, yet assembled they a troop of the most valiantest souldiers, and besieged the palace, threatening to burn the same, with Sabinus and all other the Romans that were therein, except they speedily departed; and in so doing, they promised both them and Sabinus all assurance and securitie: whereby it came to passe, that divers of them that were in the palace, issued out and submitted themselves unto them. But Rufus and Gratus having three thousand of those valiant souldiers under their charge, who had served Herod, joyned themselves with the Romans. The like did those horsemen which followed Rufus, who in like maner submitted themselves to their direction: yet for all this, the Jews continued and intended their siege, undermining the walls, and exhorting their adversaries to depart, and not to exempt them of their libertie, which they had long time enjoyed under their predecessors. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his souldiers, yet durst he not trust them in regard of their former attempt, and he suspected overmuch the over-liberall offer his enemies had made him: but neglected the same, because he expected Varus.

At the same time infinite other troubles were raised in divers other places of Judaea, according as each man either was incensed with a desire of gain, or a will to revenge. For 2000. men of warre (who had sometime served under Herod, and being at that time cashiered, lived at home) assembling themselves together assailed those of the Kings faction, who made head against them, under the conduct of Herods nephew Acabius: who never daring to encounter them in a place of equal advantage, in that they were old souldiers, & well exercised in warre, defended himself, in that he held and kept himself as neer as he could in the mountains and places of advantage. Moreover, Judas the sonne of Ezechias the archthief, whom Herod overcame with so much difficultie, at Sephoris a city of Galilee, gathering unto him a band of desperate men, made incursions upon the Kings dominions. And having taken all those arms and weapons, which he might recover in that place, he armed from the first to the last all those souldiers that were with him: he took away all that money which was reserved for the King, in that place: and affrighting the inhabitants round about him, he spoiled all those with whomsoever he met; aspiring to the kingdome, and affecting the same, not by lawfull means, of which he was unskillfull, but by a libertie to do injurie.

Whilest these troubles ranged in every place, Simon also, who had been one of Herods servants, and both for his shape, stature and strength, was esteemed amongst all men, undertook the kingdome: and being attended by a mightie armie, and proclaimed King by them, who were a wicked and unbridled multitude, and perswading himself that he was worthy to be King above any other, he first of all set fire on the palace in Jericho, and spoiled all that which was therein. He burnt also divers other royall palaces, belonging to the King, which were in divers places of the countrey, giving them free licence, who were his followers in the action, to bear away the prey that remained: and farre more licentious pranks had he played, had not his practises been speedily and wisely prevented. For Gratus, who with the Kings souldiers had coupled himself with the Romans, and gathered all the forces that he had, went out against this Simon. And after a fierce battell, they on the other side of Jordan, were put to flight; and fighting rather under courage then military discipline, they were overcome. And whilest Simon in traversing a valley sought to save himself by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

About the same time also, the royall palace of Amatha, that was fast by Jordan, was burnt by men of as bad disposition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole nation reigned this raging rebellion, for that the countrey had no King, who by his vertue might govern and moderate the people, for that the strangers, who were sent to repress these mutinies, did rather incense them through their violence and avarice. For a certain obscure and base man (neither esteemed for vertue, nor worthy regard for his riches, but being a shepheard utterly unknown beforetime, and onely famous for his huge stature and strength) called Ashmoneus, was

was so audacious to aspire to royall dignitie, and took pleasure to offer violence, setting light by his life, and exposing himself to all hazards for the onely unbridled affection he bare to soveraigntie. He had four brothers of as goodly stature as himself, who were esteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the means offered them to occupie the kingdome. Each one of these had the command over a company. For a great company of people resorted daily unto them, the charge of whom was committed unto his brethren, at such time as any occasion of warre was offered; and he in the mean while wearing the Diadem on his head, ordered, counselled, and commanded all things. The power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called King for nought: for he disposed all things according to his own pleasure, and both he and his brethren were flent with the slaughter of the Romans, and those of the Kings side, whom he hated alike; these, by reason of the insolence they had used during Herods life-time: the other, in regard of those injuries, which lately they supposed themselves to have received by them. This hatred of theirs daily increased more and more, and there was none that could escape their hands, both in respect of the gain they sought, as for the custome they had to shed blood. They therefore at that time set upon the Romans, and surprized them on the sudden neer to Emmaus, at such time as they carried victuals and munition unto their camp, and having enclosed the Centurion Arins with fourtie of their most valiant footmen, they shot him thorow with their darts. The rest that expected nothing lesse then life, were saved by Gratus, who came in upon them with the Kings souldiers: whereupon leaving the dead bodies, they retyred. Continuing their warre after this maner a long time, according as occasion was offered, they had done much mischief to the Romans, and farre more injurie to the Nation of the Jews. Finally, they were surprized; the one in an encountrie betwixt them and Gratus, the other in fighting against Ptolomey. The eldest was taken by Archelans, and the last being dismayed with the accidents, and seeing no means to escape (for besides his other mishaps, his souldiers were afflicted with sickness) he with the rest upon Archelans faith and oath submitted himself unto him. But this was done some litle while after.

At this time was all Judæa full of robberies, and as many seditious assemblies as drew together, so many Kings were there elected, who were raised to the utter ruin of the common-weal. Amongst the rest, the Romans were they that smarted least, but the murders were executed against those that were out of the country. But Varus understanding by Sabinus letters, in what dangers they were, and fearing the utter overthrow of his third legion, he took with him the two other (for to the uttermost, in Syria there were but three) and with the assistance of the Kings and Tetrarchs he hasted into Jewry, to relieve those that were besieged, commanding those that were sent out before he dislodged, to meet him at Ptolemais, and passing by the citie of the Berythians, he received a thousand, and five hundred souldiers at their hands, to attend him in his warre. Aretas also, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himself into confederacie with the Romans in regard of that hatred he bare toward Herod, sent him horsemen and footmen. When all these forces were assembled at Ptolemais, he delivered a part thereof to his sonne, and one of his friends, commanding them to make warre upon the Galileans, who bordered upon that Citie, who entring that region, and putting all those to flight, whosoever durst make head against him, he took Sephoris, and selling the inhabitants under the speare, he consumed the Citie with fire. Varus himself marching towards Samaria with his army, violenced not the Citie, in that he knew it was free from the contagion of the seditious, but he pitched his camp in a certain village, which was Ptolomies possession called Arus. The same did the Arabians burn, revenging themselves on Herods friend for his sake, and marching onward, the Arabians spoiled also another village called Sampho, and for that it was strongly fortified burned the same. Besides, in that journey nothing escaped their hands, but they put all to fire and sword. For both Emmaus was burned by Varus command, and in revenge of his souldiers that were slain in that place, it was left desolate and void of inhabitants. From thence drawing neer to Jerusalem, those Jews that besieged the legion of that side, upon the sudden view and approach of the army of the Romans, fearfully fled, giving over that siege which they intended. But those Jews of Jerusalem, being grievously reproved by Varus, alleadged in their excuse, that the people in regard of the feast were assembled in that place, and that the warre was not begun by their consent, but undertaken by their boldnesse who resorted thither from divers places, and that they were so farre off from assailing the Romans, as they rather seemed to be besieged by them. And long before this, Joseph King Herods nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their souldiers were gone out to meet Varus, and those Romans that had sustained the siege, had done no lesse.

But as touching Sabinus, he would not appear in Varus presence, by stealing away privily out of the Citie, he fled unto the seaward. Then Varus sending a part of his army thorow the whole region, sought out the authors of this sedition, and those that were noted men in the action, some of which, who were most guiltie, were punished: the rest were delivered. Now of those that were punished for this occasion, there were about two thousand crucified; and that done, seeing that this army stood him in little stead, he dismissed them. For divers disorders and outrages, contrary to Varus expresse command, were acted by his souldiers, who sought after nothing more then to increase their means by other mens miseries. And hearing that ten thousand Jews were assembled together, he hastened to apprehend them: but they not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiab advice submitted themselves. But Varus having pardoned the people for that their rebellion, sent all those that were the ringleaders thereof to Cæsar, who discharged divers of them. But he chastised certain of Herods allies, and such as bare arms with them: for that neither in regard of kindred, nor respect of justice, they had abstained from rebellious insurrection. After that Varus had in this sort appeased all the troubles in Jewry, and left the first legion in garrison in Jerusalem, he returned to Antioch.

But Archelaus was crossed in Rome by another occurrent that arose upon this occasion: Certain Embassadors of the Jews resorted thither by Varus permission, requiring that it might be lawfull for them to live according to their own laws: these presented themselves, to the number of fifty, and were backt by eight thousand Jews that inhabited the citie. And when as Cæsar had assembled the counsell of his friends, and chiefest citizens in Apollo temple, which he had builded to his mighty charge, thither resorted the Embassadors, who were followed by a troupe of Jews; and Archelaus also attended by his friends. But the Kings kindred neither stood by Archelaus in regard of the hate they bare him, and yet disdained they to assist the Embassadors, for that they were ashamed in Cæsars presence to oppose themselves against their nearest friend and kinsman. Philip also was present at that time, who by Varus perswasion resorted thither out of Syria, especially to the intent to pleade for his brother, to whom Varus wished all good fortune: besides that, hoping not a little, that if the Jews should obtain the liberty to live according to their lawes, it might come to passe that the kingdome being divided amongst Herods children, he might also light on some part thereof. After therefore the Embassadors of the Jews had obtained licence to propose their demands, pretending with themselves wholly to extinguish the royalty: they began to rip up Herods disgraces, alleading how onely in name he had been a King, whereas otherwise he had used all the tyrannous practices that the wickedest person could have invented toward the destruction of his nation, and that not content with these, he had of his own head practised and invented new. Neither that it needed them to reckon up how many he had deprived of life, when as the estate of those that were alive was far more desperate; whom he not onely affrighted with perpetual terror and severity, but also with injurious hands had not abstained from their goods. By which means it came to passe, that he not onely builded, but beautified forrain cities inhabited by forrain nations, to the end he might the rather utterly spoile those by exaction, which were situated and seated in his own Countrey: and that he enforced his nation to extreme povertie, which he received in most happy estate, whilest he spoiled those nobles of their estates, who upon weak probabilities were condemned to die, or granting them life, deprived them of their possessions. Furthermore, whereas yearly tributes were imposed on every one, yet severally was the ravenous and covetous desires of his friends and courtiers to be satisfied, yea and of his servants also, who had the authoritie to exact these things, that by this means they might redeeme their injurious vexations. As for the deflowering of virgins, and the scornfull betraying of a matrons chastitie, they covered them under silence, for that it is a great comfort to those that suffer such outrage, if their disgraces be but known to a few. In brieft, that Herod had in no other sort governed, then as if the government of them had been committed to a most savage beast. For which cause, whereas in times past that nation had been afflicted with many calamities and miseries, yet that there is no example extant amongst their monuments of antiquitie, that may be compared with their present calamitie under Herod. For which cause upon just respects they had with one consent named Archelaus their King, supposing that whatsoever King might befall them, he would alwayes demean himself more affably then Herod had done, and that to honour Archelaus they had mourned with him for his father, to gratifie him in other things, to the intent they might tie his good affection unto them: But he without delay and all at once had made manifest to the whole nation, what opinion they were to conceive of him, notwithstanding that as yet he was not confirmed king (for that it lay in Cæsars hands hands to bequeath it, yea or no) and as if he had been afraid lest he should assuredly be acknowledged for his fathers sonne, he had shewed an example of his vertue, moderation and good government, that he would use towards his subjects, by the first act which he hath committed, not onely against God, but also against men. For in the Temple it self he hath caused three thousand of his own countrey men to be slain. And how can he chuse but be justly hated, who besides his other cruelties, objecteth against us the crime of rebellion and mutiny? The effect of their request therefore was this, that they might not any more be governed by a King, nor any such like government, but that they might be annexed unto Syria, and submit themselves unto their governours that should be sent thither: That in so doing it should truly appear whether they were seditious, and addicted to changes, or whether they would live in peace at such time as they had favourable governours. After the Jews had spoken to this effect, Nicholas discharged the Kings of those accusations that were objected against them, and namely Herod, who (as he said) had never been accused all his life-time; and that it was no reason that they who justly accusing him, might have caused him to be punished during his life-time, should now addresse their accusations against him after he was dead. And as touching those things that were objected concerning Archelaus actions, it ought to be imputed to their insolence, for that engaging themselves in matters contrary to law, and having begun to murder those who sought to appease the tumult, they accused such as had kept them in obedience. Besides this, he objected against them, that they were addicted to alterations; and took pleasure to stirre up seditions, for that they knew not what thing it was to obey justice and the laws, and that there was no nation in the world so head-strong as that of the Jews; for that they would have the upper hand over all. Thus spake Nicholas.

WHEN Caesar had heard these things, he dismissed the assembly. But some few daies after, he desirous to make an end of this matter, declared Archelaus not King, but Lord of half that government that appertained to Herod, promising him to bestow a royall dignitie upon him, if so be he behaved himself vertuously, according as it became him. As for the other moitie, he divided it between two, giving a severall part thereof to each of Herods sonnes, Philip and Antipas, who debared with his brother Archelaus for the whole kingdome. The same Antipas also had the countrey on the other side of Jordan, and Galilee, with two hundreth talents of annuall renew. As for Philip, he had Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of the palace that was called by Zenodorus name, with one hundred talents. As for Archelaus, he had Idumæa, Iudæa and Samaria, which were discharged of the fourth part of the tributes by Caesar, for that they had joyned themselves with the rest of the people during the time of the sedition. Besides that, Archelaus had the tower of Straton, Sebastæ, Joppe and Jerusalem. For Gaza, Gadara and Hippon were cities of Greece which Caesar had dismembred, and adjoyned to Syria. Archelaus had five hundreth talents of yeerly rent out of his countrey. Thus was the patrimony divided among Herods sonnes. As for Salome, besides that which her brother had given her in his Will, which were the Cities of Jamnia, Azot, Phasaelis, and half a million of silver money, Caesar granted her a royall house in Ascalon; so as she received, in the whole, fixtie talents of annuall renew, and had her house allotted her within the dominion of Archelaus. All other of Herods kindred received that which was bequeathed unto them by his testament. Two of his daughters that were unmarried, were endowed by Caesar with a quarter of a million of silver money which he gave them, beside their fathers portion, and they were married to Pheroras sonnes. Moreover, he gave Herods sonnes, all that which he had given him by the testament, amounting to the summe of one thousand and five hundreth talents; contenting himself onely to receive some few moveables, not so much for their value, as in remembrance of the King, who had given them.

Caesar maketh Archelaus an Ethnarch, and bestoweth the one half of the kingdome on Philip and Antipas.

of the counterfeit ALEXANDER.

AFTER these things were in this sort disposed by Cesar, a young man and a Jew born, brought up in the cite of Sidon, by a certain Roman Libertine, intruded himself into Herods kindred, for that all those that beheld him, reported he resembled Alexander Herods sonne, who was slain by him; and by this means, he began to aspire unto the kingdome: whereupon calling to him a companion, who was his own countreyman and a long beaten Courtier, and his craftsman, and fit to execute any dangerous or desperate actions, he by his instructions fained himself to be that Alexander Herods sonne, who was delivered from death by the means of a certain friend, who had the charge to see him executed: who executing others in their steads, delivered both him and his brother Aristobulus, and that they were both escaped in this manner. Being puffed up by these toyes, he failed not to deceive other men, and as soon as he came to Crete, as many Jews soever as he fell in conference with, he perswaded them no lesse; and getting much money at their hands, he sailed into the Ile of Melos, where he gathered a great summe of money under pretext that he was of the Kings blood. And now hoping that he should recover his fathers kingdome, and that he should remunerate those who were beneficiall unto him, he hastened towards Rome, accompanied with his friends in great pomp. And being arrived at Puteol, he there also was entertained with no lesse favour by those Jews whom he deceived by his colourable title; and divers others, who had been Herods friends and familiars came unto him, and entertained him as their King. The cause hereof was the naturall disposition of men, who take pleasure in false reports, together with the report of his resemblance. For they that had frequented very familiarly with Alexander, held it for a matter most assured, that he was the man, and none other, and affirmed unto other upon their oaths that it was he; so that this rumour at last came to Rome. And all the Jews that dwelt there came forth to meet him, saying, That it was Gods handy-work, that he was after that sort preserved beyond all mens expectation: and they greatly rejoyced in his mother Mariammes behalf, from whom he was descended, and he was carried in a litter thorow the streets with all the apparell of a King, the charge whereof was defraied by those who were his friends. He was attended with a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applause, as it ordinarily falleth out at such time as beyond all expectation any one is found to have been miraculously preserved. When this news was brought to Casars eares, he gave small credit thereunto, perswading himself that it was a hard matter to deceive Herod in a cause of so great importance: notwithstanding, conforming himself in some sort to the opinions of men, he sent a certain free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly conversed with Alexander and Aristobulus during their infancy, giving him in charge to bring Alexander unto him, to the end he might see him; which he did, and was never the wiser in discovering him. This notwithstanding, Cesar was not fully deceived. For, although he resembled him somewhat, yet was not he so neerly like him, that he could deceive those who narrowly observed him. For this counterfeit Alexander had hard hands, in that he had been accustomed to labour, which the true Alexander could not have in regard of his tender and delicate education: and contrariwise this man was of a rough skinned and hard flesh. Cesar therefore discovering the treachery both of the counterfeit scholler and lying master, and how they accorded in their confident justifications, he enquired of them what was become of Aristobulus who was secretly hidder with him, and for what cause he presented not himself to enjoy the honour that appertained to those, who were so nobly descended? It was answered him, that he remained in the Ile of Cyprus, for fear of dangers, to which they are exposed who sail by sea, to the end that if any misfortune should befall him, all Mariammes race should not be extinguished, but that at leastwise Aristobulus might be left alive. Whilest he avowed these things, and the author of the fable justified no lesse, Cesar drawing the young man aside, said unto him: My friend, if thou wilt not deceive me, thou shalt have this recompence, that thou shalt not be punished. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who hath emboldned thee to practise this fraud: for this malice is so great that it surpasseth thine age: whereupon being unable to conceal the truth, he discovered the treacherie to Cesar, how and by whom it was contrived. At that time Cesar being loath to falsifie his promise that he had past to this false Alexander, and seeing that in times past he had travelled with his hands, he caused him to be enrowled among the number of his Sayers to row, and caused the other that induced him to this fraud, to be put to death, contenting

Archelaus is accused anew, and afterwards banished, and sent into Vienna.

AFTER that Archelaus had taken possession of that Sovereignty that was allotted him, he came into Judæa, where he deposed Iaazar the sonne of Boethus from the high Priesthood, accusing him to have favoured the seditious, and established Eleazar his brother in his place. After this he reedified the palace in Jericho, and sumptuously adorned it, drawing away the half of those waters which served the borough of Neara: and conveyeing them thorow a field which he had planted with Palm trees; he builded a borough in that place, which he named Archelaus, and contrary to the laws of his countrey he married Glaphyra Archelaus daughter, who had been his brother Alexanders wife, by whom also he had divers children, notwithstanding, the law of the Jews forbiddeth a man to marrie his brothers wife. Neither did Eleazar enjoy the Priesthood any long time: but during his life-time, Iesus the sonne of Sia was substituted in his place.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 19. al. 18. The Priesthood is taken from Joazar, and delivered to Eleazar, & from him to Josuah the sonne of Sia. Archelaus builded.

CThe tenth year of Archelaus government, the chiefeft governours among the Jews and Samaritanes, unable any longer to endure his crueltie and tyrannie, accused him before Casar, and especially after they had understood that he had transgressed Casars command, who had charged him to behave himself graciously towards them. Which when Casar understood, he was sore displeased, and caused Archelaus Agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome, and sent for Archelaus also: and esteeming it too base an indignitie for him to write unto him, Go (said he) unto him with all expedition, and bring him unto me without delay. He posting forward with all diligence, at length arrived in Judæa, where he found Archelaus banquetting with his friends, and having certified him of Casars pleasure, he incited him to hasten onward of his way. As soon as he came to Rome, after that Casar had heard certain of his accusers and his justifications, he banished him, and confined him in the Citie of Vienna in France, and confiscated all his goods.

Archelaus banished and confined.

But before Archelaus was sent for to Rome, he reported unto his friends this dream which ensueth: Him thought that he saw ten eares full of wheat, and very ripe, which the oxen browzed upon, and as soon as he awoke, he conceived an opinion that his vision presaged some great matter. For which cause he sent for certain sooth-sayers, who made it their profession to interpret dreams. Now whilest they were debating one with another (for they differed for the most part in their exposition) a certain man called Simon an Essean, having first of all obtained securitie and licence to speak, said that the vision pretended, that a great alteration should befall in Archelaus estate, to his utter disgrace. For the oxen signified afflictions, in respect that those kinde of creatures do ordinarily travell; and as touching the change of estate, it was signified by this, in that the earth being laboured by the travell of the oxen, retained not the same estate: and as touching the ten eares of corn, they signified the like number of years. And therefore when as one summer should be overpast, that then the time of Archelaus sovereignty should be at an end. Thus interpreted he this dream. And the fifth day after the vision thereof, Archelaus his Factor by Casars commandment came into Jewry to summon him to Rome. Some such like matter happened to Glaphyra his wife also, the daughter of King Archelaus: she (as we have said) married Alexander Herods sonne, when she was a maid, and brother to this Archelaus; who being slain by his father, she was married the second time to Inba King of Mauritania: and he also being dead, she living with her father in Cappadocia, was married to Archelaus, who put away Mariamme his wife for the love he bare unto Glaphyra. She living with Archelaus, was encountred with such a dream: She thought that she saw Alexander fast by her, who cherishing and embracing her, checked her, saying, Glaphyra, Thou approvest the truth of that proverbe, which saith, Women have no loyalty. For having given me thy faith, and married with me at such time as thou wert a virgin, and born children by me, thou hast forgotten and neglected my love, thorow the desire thou hast had to be married the second time. Neither wast thou contented to have done me this wrong, but hast taken unto thee likewise a third husband, lewdly and impudently intruding thy self into my family, and being married with Archelaus, thou art content to admit my brother for thy husband. This notwithstanding, I will

will not forget the love that I have born thee, but will deliver thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine own, as heretofore thou hast been. After that she had told this vision to certain women that were her familiars, she died very shortly after. Which accident I have thought good to register in this place, in that I was to entreat of those Kings; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a signall example, containing a most certain argument of the immortalitie of souls, and Gods providence. And if any one deem these things incredible, let him reserve his opinion to himself, and no wayes contradict those, who by such events are incited to the study of vertue. Now when the government of Archelams was annexed to Syria, Cyrenius, who had been Consull, was sent by Caesar to tax Syria, and to dispose of Archelams house.

CYRENIUS the Roman Senator having executed all degrees, offices, and dignities, untill such time as he obtained the Consulship (a man of great reckoning and estimation) was sent into Syria by Caesars direction, to do justice among the people, and to seisse and tax each mans goods: with him was sent Coponius a Captain of a company of horsemen, who was appointed to have the commandment of all Jewry. Cyrenius there-fore came into Judæa, which was already annexed unto Syria, to tax the goods of the inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelams substance. And although at the first the Jews thought but hardly of this description, yet notwithstanding without contradiction they submitted themselves, being perswaded thereunto by the counsell of the high Priest Iozar the sonne of Boethus, by whose advice they suffered themselves to be taxed without contradiction. But after this there arose a certain Jew called Iudas the Gaulanite, born in the town of Gamala, who having a certain man called Saul the Pharisee confederate with him, laboured to stirre up the people to rebellion: alledging that the description was no other thing, but a manifest confession of their servitude, exhorting all the nation to maintain their liberty, and putting them in hope that they there- by should happily establish their estates, and enjoy their goods with securitie: and besides this,

Alias, chap. 3.

A this, obtain both honour and glory in prosecution of such an enterprize. Moreover, that God would not afford them a more assured way to settle their fortunes then by this means, namely, if they would employ themselves in the execution of their designs, and if having conceived in their mindes haughty and noble attempts, they forbore not to finish the same, notwithstanding the execution cost them their lives. These speeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleasure, and by the same they were the more confirmed and heartned to rebellion. So that there was no kinde of evil which these men set not abroad; yea the whole nation was replenished with such miseries, that it is impossible to recount them: for the wars therein continued with such fury, that it was impossible to restrain the violence thereof; so that they neither spared friends, nor respected enemies, but were wholly given over to the spoile. There reigned nothing but robberies and murders of noble personages, who entertained one another under pretence to establish the state of the Common-weale, but in effect for their private profit sake, whereby the cities were replenished with seditions and murders; in which the inhabitants slaughtered one another, after a strange manner of fury, and desire they had not to spare any that was of their contrary faction. They were afflicted with forraign enemies and famine; yet none of these could pacifie their fury, but that they furiously razed Cities, shed innocent blood, till at length the horrible mischief took such a head, that they consumed the Temple of God, and burned all the beautifull buildings. So dangerous a thing is it to change the customes and manners of a country. For Judas and Sadoc having introduced and raised a fourth sect, and tying the Sectaries to their command, filled the whole Common-weale for the present with many troubles, and produced the roots of these mischiefs, which afterwards branched abroad from this unaccustomed sect. For which cause I think it not amisse to discourse briefly of these Sectaries opinions, whereby so many evils have fallen upon our nation:

CHAP. II.

How many, and what sects there were among the Jews.

Here were three sects among the Jews, of long continuance and antiquitie: that of the Essians; that of the Sadduces; and that of those who were called Pharisees. Of these have we spoken in our second book, of the warres of the Jews; and yet now I think it not amisse to speak somewhat of them in this place also. The Pharisees use a very austere and strict kinde of life, and addict not themselves to any delicacie, but diligently follow that which their reason induceth them unto. They honour their elders, neither dare they reply, or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things unto fate, and yet they take not an assent of will from man; supposing that God tempereth all things in such sort, that by his ordinance and mans will all things are performed good or evil. They beleeve also that the soules of men are immortall; and that under the earth they receive judgement of honour or disgrace, according as they have addicted themselves to vertue or vice in their life times: the one to live in perpetuall prison; the other to rise again very shortly. For which cause they are in great estimation among the people; and all that which appertaineth to the service of God, whether they be prayers or sacrifices, all things are done according as they give direction. So ample a testimony yeeld the Cities of their wisdom, temperance and honest life. But the Sadduces are of that opinion, that the souls of men perish with their bodies. They observe no other thing but that which is in the law, and hold it a vertue to dispute with their masters, as touching the decrees of their sect. Their opinion is entertained by very few, yet such, who for the most part are men of the best reckoning; yet entermeddle they not in any case with any affairs: and when they are advanced to any honours, either with their own good liking, or with constraint, they are enforced to allow of that which the Pharisees shall propose, otherwise the common people will not endure them. The Essians attribute unto God the government and disposition of all things. They say that the soules of men are immortall, and all the uttermost of their endeavour and delight is to maintain justice and equitie. They send their offerings unto the temple, yet sacrifice they not with other men, by reason they use more sacred and different ceremonies: for which cause they are secluded out of the common Temple, and sacrifice apart. Otherwise, they are men of most reconciled behaviour, and such as are wholly addicted to trimming and labouring their fields. They have one custome which is worthy admiration, and such a one as is not to be found amongst any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make any reckoning of vertue, which they have not practised for a little while, but even from from all antiquitie; which is, that they possesse their goods in common: neither doth the richest amongst them make more use of his possessions then he that hath least of all. They are at least foure thousand in number, who neither have wives nor slaves; supposing that women are the occasion of injustice, and that slaves doe arise by mutinies: and living apart by themselves, they serve one another, and choose out certain upright men among their Priests to gather the fruits and revenews of their lands, to the end they may be sustained and nourished thereby: In a word, they follow the same course of life that they doe, who are called Plisti among the Danes. The fourth sect was founded by Judas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Pharisees, but that they are extremely zealous of their libertie, acknowledging but one onely God, Lord and Master of all things, and had rather both themselves with their dearest children and kinsfolk endure the most grievous and bitter torments that may be imagined, then cal any mortall man their Lord. Of which constancie of theirs I forbear to discourse any further at this time, for that it is sufficiently known unto divers, who have been eye-witnesses thereof: neither fear I lest any one should suppose those things to be incredible, which I have said of them; but contrariwise, that I have spoken lesse then they themselves make evident in contemning their grievous tortures and punishments; which courage and magnanimitie of theirs increased very mightily amongst our nation, being kindled by the most hainous injuries which were offered us by Gessius Florus our Governor, by which means at length it came to passe that they revolted and rebelled against the people of Rome. Thus much as touching the sects among the Jews.

CHAP. III.

The Tetrarches HEROD and PHILIP builded Cities in honour of CAESAR.

AFTER that Cyrenius had confiscated Archelaus goods, and finished the valuation of every mans estate (which hapned 37. yeers after Antonies overthrow by Caesar in the Actian battell) he deposed Joazar from the Priestly dignitie, by reason of that sedition which the people stirred up against him, and established Ananus the sonne of Seth in his place. But Herod and Philip took each of them the possession of their Tetrarchy, and disposed of the affairs thereof. Herod inclosed Sephoris with a strong wall, and made it the chiefest city and ornament of Galilee: he fortified also another citie called Betaramphtha, and named it Julias in honour of Julia the Emperour Caesar wife. Philip repaired Pancada situated neer unto the source of Jordan, and called it Caesarea: he repaired also the borough of Bethsaida neer unto the lake of Genazereth, and gave it the dignitie of a city, both for the number of the inhabitants, as for other preeminences, and called it Julia by Caesar wives name. As for Coponius the Governour in Judaea, who (as we have said) was sent with Cyrenius, in his time there hapned that which followeth. At the feast of unleavened bread, which we call Pascha, the custome was that the Priests opened the Temple gates about midnight: at which time certain Samaritans, who secretly entered into Jerusalem, as soon as the gates were open, spred mens bones amidst the porches, and over all the Temple: whereby it came to passe, that the Priests began to keep a more diligent watch, then they had done before-time.

Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambivivus succeeded him in the government. In his time Salome King Herods sister departing out of this life, bequeathed unto Julia the City of Iamnia and all the lands and countrey round about: she gave her also Phasaelis situate in the Plain, and Archelais where there are divers Date trees, bearing most excellent fruit. After Ambivivus, Annius Rufus had the command, under whom died Caesar the second Roman Emperour, after he had reigned fifty seven yeers, six moneths and two daies, and had Antonius his copartner in the monarchy for the space of fourteen yeers. He lived in the whole seventy seven yeers.

After Caesar succeeded Tiberius Nero the sonne of Julia his wife, who was the third Roman Emperour. He it was that sent the fifth Governour into Judaea, whose name was Valerius GRATUS, who succeeded Annius Rufus. This Gratus deposed Ananus, and appointed Ismael the son of Fabius High Priest: and after his decease (for he lived but a little while after) Eleazar the son of Ananus was made high Priest. A yeer after this, this Eleazar was also deposed, and the Priesthood was given to Simon the son of Camithus: who continuing in this dignitie for a yeers space and no longer, Joseph called Caiphas succeeded after him. After Gratus had behaved himself thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Judaea for the space of 11. yeers. After him came Pompey Pilate, and succeeded him in the government. But

A But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius friendship, builded a citie in honour of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfulllest part of Galilee, hard by the lake Genazareth, and neer unto the naturall bathes in the borough called Emmaus. This City was peopled by strangers, who resorted thither from all parts; and by divers, of the countries of Galilee, some of which were constrained to inhabit the same. Some of those likewise, who were in authoritie repaired thither, and from all countries there flocked many, who were not assuredly held for men of free condition; all which he enfranchised, and gave them great gifts, under that condition, that they should not abandon the Citie. To some of them he gave houses already builded; to others some lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the habitation of such a place was contrary to the laws and customes of his countrey, and the ordinances of the Jews; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of sepulchres: and our law saith, he that converseth in those places, is held unclean and defiled for the space of seven dayes.

Tiberias builded.

At that very time died Phraates King of Parthia, being traiterously slain by his son Phraataces, for this cause. After that Phraates had gotten many lawfull children, he took unto him an Italian woman to his concubine, called Thermusa, whom with other presents Julius Caesar had sent unto him. After he had begotten on her his son Phraataces, he was so much besotted with her beauty, that he took her to his wife, and held her in high estimation. She that might perswade him unto all that whatsoever she listed, enforced herself to the uttermost to make her sonne king of Parthia: and seeing that she might not attain thereunto, except she had first found out the means to deliver her self of Phraates lawfull children, she perswaded him to send them hostages to Rome. In a word, they were presently sent away, because Phraates in no sort had the power to contradict Thermusa's will, and openly Phraataces was brought up in the affairs of estate; who thinking the time too tedious and long, if he should expect the kingdom whilest his father was dead, conspired against him by the instigation and furtherance of his mother, with whom (as it is thought) he committed incest. In effect, being equally attainted of these two hainous crimes, both for the murder of his father, as his incest committed with his mother, he was generally hated by his subjects, who rebelled against him before such time as he was settled in his kingdom. By this means was his fortune overthrown, and he died. The noble men among the Parthians, perceiving that it was impossible for them to maintain their policy without a King, and that their King ought lineally to descend of the race of the Arfacians (because by custome they might not chuse any out of another stock) and supposing that their ordinances had too much already been broken, and that it would redound to their great dishonour if the kingdom should be continued in the hands of such a man, who was descended from an Italian concubine, they sent Embassadors to require Herod to come and be their King, who otherwise was in hatred with all the people, and accused of extreme cruelty. In a word, he was an unfociable man, and extremely cholerick, notwithstanding he were of the bloud of the Arfacides: they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a banquet made at a certain sacrifice (for the custome of the Parthians was, that every one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was slain at such time as he was a hunting. For this cause, they sent Embassadors to Rome, requiring that one of those that were hostages there might be their King, and one Vonones was sent unto them, who was preferred above all his brethren. For he seemed to be capable of that high degree of honour, as to command two of the greatest sovereignties that were under the sunne; the one of his own nation, the other of a forrain dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature mutable and most impatient of indignitie, shortly after repented themselves: for they disdained to execute the command of a slave (for so called they a pledge) saying, that the Parthians had not a King given them by right of war, but that which was the most outrage that might befall them, by injurie offered them in the time of peace. For which cause they speedily sent for Artabanus King of Media, who was of the race of the Arfacides. To this request of theirs he willingly condescended, and came unto them with his army. And Vonones marched forward to make head against him. At the first encounter, although the common sort among the Parthians favoured Artabanus, yet was he overcome and fled to the mountains of Media. But not long after, having assembled a greater army, he once more set upon Vonones and discomfited him, at which time Vonones retired himselfe with some horsemen of his into Seleucia. But Artabanus having made a great slaughter of those that fled, and wholly abashed the mindes of the Barbarians, he retired himself to the Citie of Ctesiphon, with those people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made King of Parthia. Vonones arrived in Armenia, and at the first sought to make himselfe King over that nation, sending to this effect certain Embassadors to Rome: but Tiberius repulsed his suit suit in respect of his cowardize, but the rather for that Artabanus by an expresse Embassage had threatned him with warre. For they of the greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the floud Niphates) maintained Artabanus title; and Vonones, destitute of all hope to obtain the Kingdom, yeeked himself to Syllanus, who was governour of Syria, and in regard that he had been brought up at Rome, he was kept in Syria: and Artabanus gave Armenia to Orodes, one of his sonnes. Antiochus King of the Comagenes died also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the commons and the nobilitie, so that both parties sent their Embassadors to Rome. The nobles required that the forme of their government might be changed into divers signories; and the people requested that they might be honoured by a King, as they had been accustomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affairs in the East, fortune thereby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, at such time as he arrived in the East, and orderly disposed all things, he was poysoned by Piso: whereof he died, as it is declared in another place.

PILATE Governour of Judæa led his army from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, where he wintered them with an intent to bring in Cæsars statues, and standards into the Citie, in contempt of our law which forbiddeth us to make images. For which cause, those Governours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the City without such pictures or paintings. Pilate was the first, who unawares and by night entered Jerusalem, bringing with him his images. Which when the people understood, in great multitudes they resorted to Cæsarea, beseeching him for many dayes, that he would transport those images into some other place. But when as Pilate denied them to performe their request, because the matter would redound to Cæsars dishonour, and the Jews also ceased not to sollicite him; some six daies after commanding his souldiers to lie in ambush in a readinesse, he sate him down in the Tribunall within the Hippodrom, making use of the opportunitie of the place, for that it was most fit for a stratagem. There being urged once more about the same businesse, he gave a sign to his souldiers to beset them, threatning them with death, except they would presently give over their suite, and repaire every one of them with all speed to their own houses. But they prostrating themselves upon the earth, and offering their naked throats, told him that they rather desired to die, then to see their laws violated, which were with so great judgement and reason proposed unto them. Pilate amazed at the confidence they shewed in the conservation of their laws, suddenly caused Cæsars images to be transported out of Jerusalem into Cæsarea, and out of the sacred treasure he made certain conduits of water, that had their fountain heads more then two hundred stades off. But the people took no pleasure in these conduits, and divers thousands of men assembled themselves exclaiming against Pilate, endeavouring thereby to make him give over his enterprize. Some of them also uttered divers injurious speeches against him, as it ordinarily falleth out amongst an unbridled multitude. But he caused them to be hemmed in by a great number of his souldiers, attired in popular habit, as soon as they began to exclaime against him, gave a sign to his souldiers: they, as it was before time commanded them, made use of their maces; and without distinction either of the persons or the offenders, fell on all those whom they had encompassed; and sounmercifully laid on them, who were naked and disarmed, that some of them were slain, other some grievously hurt: and after this manner was the tumult and sedition appeased.

At that time was JESUS, a wise man, if it be lawfull to call him a man. For he was the performer of divers admirable works, and the instructor of those who willingly entertain the truth: and he drew unto him divers Jews and Greeks to be his followers. This was CHRIST, who being accused by the Princes of our nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the crosse by him; yet did not those who followed him from the beginning, forbear to love him for the ignomie of his death. For he appeared unto them alive the third day after, according as the divine Prophets had before testified the same, and divers other wonderfull things of him; and from that time forward the race of the Christians, who have derived their name from him, hath never ceased.

At that time also there fell out another accident, which very sore troubled the Jews, and in the Temple of Isis at Rome there were many shamefull acts committed. But I will first of all recount the accident in the Temple of Isis; and then will I declare that which befell the Jews.

A Jews. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowned both for the nobility of her house, as also through her studie and exercise in vertue. Besides this, she was very rich, and with her riches beautifull, and in her flourishing years; and notwithstanding a very mirrour of chastitie. She was married to a certain noble man called Patrumus, that equall'd her in all those her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the knights of greatest account at that time, fell in love with her. But she was of that disposition, that it was impossible for him to corrupt her by presents: And the more she refused those infinite presents which he sent unto her, the more was Mundus heart inflamed with ardent affection; so that to enjoy her but onely one night, he offered her two hundred thousand drachmes, amounting in our English money to some six thousand pound; yet for all this he could not overcome her. For which cause being unable to induce this his unfortunate love, he thought best to pine himselfe away for want of sustenance; thereby to deliver himselfe from the tyranny of that passion, wherewith he was afflicted. Finally, that he confidently resolved, he constantly put in execution. Now there was a certain freewoman that belonged to Mundus father, whose name was Ida, expert in all sorts of subtilties, who being fore agrieved to behold the young mans resolution, whom she saw wholly addicted to a desperat death, she addressed her selfe unto him, & encouraged him with hope, promising him to bring him to Paulinas speech, by the means of a certain bribe which she intended to offer. He rejoicing very much at her motion, demanded what summe should serve her; who requiring nothing more then fifty thousand drachmes to obtain Paulina, he furnished her presently. When as by this means she had quickned the young mans spirit, and received all that which she demanded, she shap'd not the same course which others had kept that had the sollicitari-
B of the matter before, seeing she saw that money would not tempe her, but knowing that she was deeply devoted to the service of Isis, she practised this subtil and unexpected policie. She addressed her selfe to certain Priests of the temple, and upon great hopes, and offer of greater presents, and paying them down upon the present, twenty and five thousand drachmes, and promising them as much more upon the performance of the bargain, she disclosed unto them the passionate love which the young man bare unto Paulina, exhorting them to work so wisely that he might enjoy her. They bewitched with this huge present they had, & hoped to receive, promised her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldest among them resorted to Paulina, and having free access unto her presence, he required that he might have conference with her in secret: which when he had obtained, he told her that he was sent unto her by god Anubis, in that the god was surprized with her love, and desired that she would come unto him. Paulina, took great pleasure in this his discourse, and told her familiars how she had been honoured with the amorous sollicitation of a god, and certified her husband how Anubis would banquet and lie with her. Whereunto he consented, knowing how great his wives chastitie was. She therefore repaired to the temple; and after she had sup't, and the time was come wherein she was usually accustomed to lay her down to rest, and the gates were lockt up by the Priests that were therein, and the lightes likewise were taken away; Mundus, who lay hid within, failed not to accost her: who thinking that it was god Anubis satisfied his desires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the Priests, who were privie to this treacherie, were stirring, he retired himself: Paulina also early in the morning repaired to her husband, and certified him how Anubis had appeared unto her, and boasting her self among her familiars what conference he had used with her. But some of them beleev'd her not, in regard of the maner of their entertainment, the rest were altogether amazed, supposing those things to be no waies incredible; at such time as they be-
C thought themselves of the Ladies chastitie. Some three daies after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, said unto her: You have saved me two hundred thousand drachmes, wherewith you might have augmented your treasure, and this notwithstanding, you have not failed to satistie my request: neither am I grieved that you have contemned me under the name of Mundus, since that undertaking Anubis name, I have accomplished my desire, and this said, he departed. But she presently amazed with the mans audacious impudence, tore her garments, and having told her husband of all this subtil circumvention, she requested earnestly his assistance, and that he would not forsake her in the prosecution of her revenge: who presently certified the Emperour of each particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently understood, how all things had happened, by the inquisition and examination of the Priests, he condemned them and Ida, who had been the inventor and comploter of this treason against Paulina, to be hang'd: he pulled down the temple also, and cast Anubis statue into Tyber, and banished Mundus, supposing that he ought ought not to be more grievously punished, considering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extreme love: Behold here the insolence committed in the temple of Isis, by the Priest that appertained to that temple. Now I intend to declare that which hapned to the Jews that were at that time in Rome, according as heretofore I both purposed and promised.

CHAP. V.

Of that which befell the Jews that were at Rome in PILATES time.

Fulvia Saturnina's wife delivered gold and purple to be sent to the temple in Jerusalem, they convert it to their own uses, which when Tiberius knew he commanded all the Jews to be thrust out of Rome.

Here was a certain Jew, that having been accused for the breach of the laws of his country, and fearing to be punished for the same, fled from thence, being without respect, a man of a most mischievous behaviour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himself to be an expounder of Moses law, and drawing to him three other no lesse reprobates then himself, he followed his ordinary profession. Fulvia a Lady of much honour became their scholler, and had embraced the religion of the Jews, whom they had perswaded to send certain purple and gold to the temple of Jerusalem: which after they had received at her hands, they converted it to their own use, as before that time they had determined to doe. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar friend, and Fulvia husband, who had discovered the same unto him, commanded all Jews whatsoever to depart out of Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out and enrouled to the number of foure thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia: and punished divers of them that refused to bear arms, for fear they should transgresse the ordinances of their country. So that by reason of the loose behaviour of foure wicked persons, all those of our nation were driven out of the city of Rome.

Pilate accused before Vitellius, is sent to Rome.
Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 8. al. 12.

Vitellius cometh to Jerusalem, forgiveth the Jews their tribute, and committeth the charge of the high Priests garments to them. The high Priests vestments reserved in the castle of Antonia.

Neither was the nation of the Samaritans exempt from this trouble: for a certain subtil companion, who sought by all the means he might to incroach upon the peoples favour, perswaded them to withdraw themselves with him to the mount Garizim (which they supposed to be the holiest amongst all their mountains) in which place, he avowed he would shew them the sacred Vessels buried in a certain place, where Moses had laid them: and at that time they being gathered together in arms, by his perswasion encamped themselves in a borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither to adjoyn themselves with them, to the end they might ascend the mountain with the greater company. But Pilate prevented them, and got up before them with his horsemen and footmen: who charging those that were assembled in the borough, put them to flight, and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them prisoners with him. Pilate executed the chiefeest ring-leaders amongst them, and those also of greatest force amongst the fugitives. The tumult of these Jews being published abroad, and their misfortune made known, the Senate of Samaria addressed themselves to Vitellius who had been Consul, and who at that time governed Syria, before whom they accused Pilate for the murder of those whom he had slain, saying that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebell against the Romans, but to warrantize themselves against Pilate tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Narcissus his friend, to take charge of Judæa, commanding Pilate to return to Rome, and to satisfie the Emperour in those things whereof the people had accused him. Hereupon Pilate, after he had sojourned ten years in Jewry, repaired to Rome, having no means to contradict that commandement that Vitellius had given him. But before he arrived there, Tiberius was departed and dead.

CHAP. VI.

VITELLIUS cometh to Jerusalem.

As soon as Vitellius came into Judæa, he went up to Jerusalem and celebrated there the feast of the passover, and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgave the citizens all the tribute of those fruits which were sold. He delivered them also the ornaments of the high Priests, with all the rest of the priestly furniture within the Temple, committing the charge thereof unto the Priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were laid up in the Castle of Antonia for this cause which followeth: Hircanus the high Priest the first of that name (for divers have been so called) having builded a tower neer unto the Temple, did for the most part make make his residence therein, and there kept his vestments that were committed to his charge, the rather for that he onely had the authoritie to put them on, and return them into their place at such time as he came down into the Ciry, and put upon him his accustomed raiment. His son and his sons son entertained the same custome, till such time as Herod being exalted to the kingdome, and seeing this tower to be strongly sited, builded the same most magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Antony his great friend. And having found these vestments in the place, he retained them with him, assuring himselfe, the people would attempt nothing against him. Archelaus his sonne and successor in the kingdome, kept the same course that Herod had done. But after that the Romanes had obtained the soveraigntie thereof, they kept the high Priests ornaments in their hands, and reserved them in a place builded for the purpose, under the scale of the Priests: and the Prefect of those that kept the sacred treasure, lighted the lampe every day in that place. This every seventh day before the feast, doth the Prefect deliver it into the high Priests hands, and after it was purified, he put it on to doe divine service, and the next day after the feast he returneth it again to the same place where it was kept before: which custome was observed thrice every yeer in the time of a fast. But Vitellius returned those ornaments into the hands of the Priests, according to the ancient orders, leaving them to be used at such time as need required, commanding the Prefect to trouble himselfe no more about the place where they should be kept. After he had done this favour to the nation of the Jews, he deposed the high Priest Joseph surnamed Caiaphas, and advanced Jonathan the sonne of Ananias to that dignitie, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

The year of the world, 3999. after the nativity of Christ, 33.

Vitellius advanced Jonathan the son of Ananias to the Priesthood and degraded Joseph surnamed Caiaphas.

At that time he received letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a friendship with Artabanus the King of the Parthians (whose hatred he suspected, and feared, lest being seized of Armenia, he should work further displeasure to the state of Rome) willing him to assure the league by hostages, and namely with Artabanus sonne. After Tiberius had written these letters above mentioned unto Vitellius, he perswaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great store of money, that with all expedition they should make warre against Artabanus. But the Iberians would not be drawn thereunto, yet suffered they the Alanes to march thorow their countrey, and opened them their gates of the mount Caspius, to give them passage to invade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the countrey of the Parthians was filled with warre, whereby the chiefeft among them were slain, and all their estate was spoiled and disordered. The Kings sonne also was slain in those conflicts, with divers thousands of his men of warre. Moreover, Vitellius having sent money to a certain kinsman and friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiving the plot that was intended against him, and seeing that he could not escape, because it was attempted by a great number of the best accounted nobles within his court, ceased to passe any further: and seeing himselfe most apparantly invironed, and thinking that under colour of friendship he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himselfe into the Provinces of the higher countrey, and there to save himselfe, rather then to put himselfe in hazard, and resort unto them who had already betrayed and forsaken him. Arriving in that place, he assembled a great number of souldiers of the countries of Danes, and Swethians: and having fought against them who opposed themselves against him, he recovered his estate. When Tiberius had tydings hereof, he wrought the means to draw Artabanus into friendship with him: which when Artabanus had notice of, he willingly admitted, so that Artabanus and Vitellius met together neer Euphrates, and by the means of a bridge that was builded upon the river, they debated the matter together, being each of them attended by their guards. After that they had concluded the peace, Herod the Tetrarch feasted them in a very magnificent Pavillion, erected in the midst of the flood, not without his great cost. And not long after, Vitellius sent Darius, Artabanus son in hostage to Rome, with divers presents, amongst which there was a man seven cubits high, a Jew born, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Gyant by reason of his greatnesse. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon. But Herod desirous to be the first that should advertise Cesar of the receipt of these hostages, sent expresse messengers with letters, by which he fully satisfied him of all that which had happened, omitting nothing for the Consul to certifie: so that after Vitellius letters were brought unto him, and that Cesar had already certified him of the true information that Herod had given him, Vitellius was sore troubled: and suspecting lest he had received a greater injurie then the matter made shew for, he conceived in his heart a secret despight, which continued untill such time as Tiberius was dead, and Caligula obtained the Empire.

At that time also died Philip Herods brother, in the twentieth year of Tiberius reign, after he had reigned himselfe for the space of seven and thirty yeeres, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, and Bathanara. During all the time of his government, he behaved himselfe very peaceably, and farre from businesse. For he made his ordinary abode within his own dominion. He walked being accompanied with a small number of his chosen servants, and had that seat carried after him wherein he was accustomed to sit and doe Justice: and therein fate he, to the end that if any one presented himselfe, and required his assistance, he might without delay doe him right. For upon the first motion, the seat was placed in that part wherein the plain- tiffe met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guilty, and absolving the innocent. He died in Juliade, and was buried in the sepulchre which he himselfe had caused to be built, and his obsequies were performed with great so- lemneitie and majesty. And for that he left no heirs males behinde him, Tiberius seized his estate, which he annexed to the government of Syria, ordaining that the tributes that were gathered in his Tetrarchy, should be kept within the bounds of the same region.

Eane-while, Aretas King of Arabia Petraea, and Herod fell at strife, the one with the other, for this cause that ensueth: Herod the Tetrarch married Aretas daughter, with whom he had lived married a very long time. Afterwards taking his jour- ney towards Rome, he lodged with Herod his halfe brother by the fathers side (for Herod was the sonne of Simons daughter, which Simon was the high Priest) and there being surprized with the love of Herodias his brothers wife, which was the daugh- ter of Aristobulus their brother, and sister to the Great Agrippa, he was so bold as to offer her some speech of marriage: which when she had accepted, the accords were made between them, that at such time as he should return from Rome, he should displace her, and lead her away with him, with conditions that he would banish Aretas daughter farre from him. After he had ratified those covenants, he made his voyage to Rome, from whence he no sooner returned and performed that for which he went, but his wife (who had some privie notice of the conventions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before he suspected that she knew thereof, required him to send her to the Castle of Macheron, which was the frontier town betwixt Herods and Aretas countries, without certifying him any waies of her intent. Herod without suspect easily condescended unto her request, thinking she was igno- rant of his drift: but she long before that time had taken order with the Governour of Ma- cheron (which at that time was under her fathers government) to prepare all things for her journey, where being arrived, she speedily posted into Arabia, under the convoy of those Governours, who received and conducted her the one after the other. As soon as she ar- rived in her fathers Court, she incontinently certified him of Herods resolution, whence arose the beginning of this discord betwixt them. As soon as therefore they had both of them as- sembled their armies upon the confines of the countrey of Gamalite, they fought together under the conduct of the two Generals, to whom they had committed their armies. In this battell Herods army was wholly discomfited through the treason that was complotted a- gainst him by certain banished men of Philips Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herod. Ti- berius was certified of all this by those letters which Herod had written unto him: and being fore displeased with Aretas for his proud attempt, he commanded Vitellius to make warre a- gainst him, willing him that if he could take him alive, he should send him bound unto him; but if dead, he should send him his head. Such was the commission that Tiberius sent to the Governour of Syria.

Divers Jews were of the opinion, that Herods army was overthrown by the just vengeance of God, who punished him most justly, because of the execution which he caused to be done on John surnamed Baptist: For he had done this man to death, who was replenished with all vertue, and who exhorted the Jews to addict themselves hereto, and to execute justice to- wards men, and piety towards God: exhorting them to be baptized, and telling them that baptisme should at that time be agreeable unto God, if they should renounce not onely their sinnes, but if to the puritie of their bodies they should annex the cleanness of their soules re- purified by justice. And whereas it came to passe that divers shocked and followed him to beare his doctrine, Herod feared lest his subjects allured by his doctrine and persuasions should

A should be drawn to revolt. For it seemed that they would subscribe in all things to his advice; he therefore thought it better to prevent a mischief by putting him to death, then to expect some sudden commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Upon this suspicion Herod caused him to be bound, and sent to the Castle of Macheron, whereof we have spoken heretofore, and there was he put to death. The Jews were of opinion, that in revenge of this so grievous a sinne, Herods army, against whom God was displeased, had been subject to their utter ruine and overthrow. But Vitellius being addressed to make warre against Aretas, gathered together two legions, and all those horse or foot that he could assemble amongst those Kings, who were the Romanes allies, and marching towards Petra he stayed at Ptolemais, because he pretended to passe by Judæa. Which when the principall nobles amongst the Jews had notice of, they went out to meet him, beseeching him that he would not passe thorow their countrey, because it was a custome amongst them not to see any images borne, such as he had of divers colours in his army. Whereunto he condescended, and having changed his purpose, he caused his army to march thorow the great Plain: as for himselfe he came to Jerusalem accompanied with Herod the Tetrarch and his friends, to offer sacrifice to God upon the next festivall day, where he was most magnificently received by all the people of the Jews. There sojourned he for the space of three dayes, during which time he deposed Jonathan from the high Priesthood, and invested Theophilus his brother. The fourth day letters came unto him that advertised him of Tiberius death, for which cause he commanded the oath of fidelitie should be ministred to the people, in the new Emperour Caius behalfe. He called his army back also, and sent them to their wintering garrison, because it was not lawfull for him to prosecute the warre, by reason the sovereign estate was fallen unto Caius.

It is said, that Aretas hearing news of Vitellius expedition or voyage, and after he had taken counsell of the Augurs, said, that the army should not finde engines to pierce as farre as Petra, because the Chieftain thereof, or he that had the command of the expedition, or he that obeyed his ordinance in conducting the same, or he against whom the army was conducted, should die. Vitellius therefore retired himselfe to Antioch. A year before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa Aristobulus sonne came to Rome, to intreat with the Emperour about certain affairs, according to the power which he should obtain at his hands. But before I speak any thing hereof, I will relate Herods progeny, both for that it is pertinent to this present narration, as also that the greatnesse of Gods providence may appeare, to the end that a man may know that neither the number of children, nor any other humane force whatsoever it be, can be availeable without the fear of God; considering that within the space of one hundredth yeers or somewhat lesse, it so fell out, that all Herods line, which was very populous and fruitfull, was extinguished, a very few excepted. Whereby we are given to understand, what the misery of mankind is, and learn to moderate our own selves. It is also expedient to speak something of Agrippa, who amongst all other deserveth admiration, in that being a man wholly drowned in obscuritie and base in birth, he was exalted to such greatnesse, as no one of those that knew him would ever have thought his fortune should have such successe and mightinesse. And although heretofore I have spoken somewhat of this matter, yet it is requisite that I speak something more expressly thereof in this place. Herod the great had two daughters borne by Mariamme Hircanus daughter. The one of them which was called Salampso, was married by Herod to Phasalus the sonne of Phasalus, who was Herods brother. The other called Cypros was espoused to Antipater her Cousin, who was Salomes sonne, who was Herods sister. Phasalus had five children by Salampso: three sonnes, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, whom Agrippa the sonne of Aristobulus married, and Alexandra was married to Timæus of Cyprus, who was a man of great dignitie, and with whom she died without issue. Cypros had by Agrippa her husband two sons and three daughters: Bernice, Mariamme, and Drusilla: their two sonnes were called Agrippa and Drusus. Drusus died very young: but Agrippa was brought up by his grandfather amongst his other brethren, Herod, Aristobulus, and Bernice. These were Herods children, sonne unto him who was surnamed the great; Bernice was Costobarus daughter, begotten on Salome Herods sister: Aristobulus died leaving his children under age, under his fathers charge with Alexander his brother, as we have already recounted. These attaining their full age were in this sort married: Herod brother to Agrippa was matched with Mariamme Olympias daughter, who was Herod the Great his daughter, and of Ioseph Herods brother: By her he had his sonne Aristobulus: Aristobulus Agrippas third brother married Iocape the daughter Sampsigeram King of the Emeseniens. They had a daughter which in like sort was called Iocape, which was deafe.

These were the children begotten by Herods three sonnes. But Herodias their sister married Herod the sonne of Herod the Great, whom he begot on Mariamme the daughter of Simon the high Priest, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias in contempt of the laws of the countrey, married her self with Herod her husbands brother begotten of the same father, being separated from him during his life-time; who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His daughter Salome was married to Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis Herods sonne: who dying without children, Aristobulus married her, who was Herods sonne and Agrippas brother. They had three sonnes, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. See here the posteritie of Phaselus and Salampson. Antipater by Cypris had a daughter that in like sort was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Seleius the sonne of Alexas, of whom he begat a daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I said) were Antipaters brothers, they died without issue. Alexander Herods sonne, who was slain by his father, begat Alexander and Tigranes on the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Tigranes being King of Armenia died without issue, after he had been accused at Rome. Alexander had a sonne called Tigranes, after his brothers name, who was sent by Nero to reign in Armenia, who had a sonne called Alexander, who married Iotape the daughter of Antiochus King of Comagena. This Alexander by Vespasian was elected King in Lesis a Citie of Cilicia. As soon as Alexanders posteritie began to multiply, they fell from their countrey religion, to follow the customes of the Greeks. All the rest of King Herods daughters died without issue. Having after this maner reckoned up Herods posteritie, which continued untill such time as Agrippa the great began to reign; it remaineth at this time to declare what adventures befell this Agrippa, and how he escaping his dangers, obtained at last so great power and dignitie.

CHAP. VIII.

AGRIPPAS voyage to TIBERIUS, where he is accused and shut in prison, and is delivered after TIBERIUS death, by CAIUS his successor.

SOME little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa conversing at Rome, grew into great familiaritie and acquaintance with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperours sonne, and was beloved by Antonia the wife of Drusus the elder, by the means of his mother Bernice, whom Antonia held in great estimation, and to whom she had recommended her sonne. And whereas by nature he was of a liberrall and high spirit, as long as his mother lived, he would not discover his intent, lest he should provoke her displeasure against him. But incontinently after Bernice was dead, and he became Lord of himself, partly by his daily and bountifull entertainiment and living, partly by his immoderate liberalities, but especially by his lavish prodigalitie towards Casars freemen, whose favour he hunted after, he was brought into extreme povertie, and could no more live at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius having lost his sonne, forbade his friends to come into his sight, for fear lest their presence should refresh and increase the sorrow he conceived for the losse of his sonne. For these causes he returned back into Judaea, having but badly ordered his estate, spent his money, and left himself no means to satisfie his importunate and many creditors. For which cause incertain how to dispose himself, and alarmed of his present estate, he withdrew himself into a Castle called Malatha in Idumaea, be- thinking himself after some sort to cut off his miserable daies. Which purpose of his, when Cypros his wife perceived, she endeavoured by all means to prevent his resolution: she wrote also to his sister Herodias, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, certifying her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessitie he was enforced thereunto: and she exhorted her, that in regard of affinitie she would assist him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, relieved his misery, although her fortunes were farre weaker then hers. Being therefore sent for by his sister and wife, he was commanded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certaine summe of money assigned him for his maintenance, and for his greater honour was appointed Magistrate of that City. Yet did not Herod continue long time in that minde, although by the means he had given him, he had not satisfied his kinsmans necessities. For being in the citie of Tyre in a certain company, where he drank immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extreme injurie, that Herod had upbraided him with his poverty, and hit him in the teeth that he maintained him at his charge. For which cause he withdrew himself to Helios, who had sometimes been Consul at Rome, and for the present was President of Syria, with

with whom at Rome he had fallen into familiarity, who entertained by him lived with him, who long before that time had entertained Aristobulus; who though Agrippas brother, yet was he his enemy; yet notwithstanding this dissension between them, Flaccus entertained them both with equall favour. But Aristobulus remitted nothing of his hatred he bare his brother, neither ever rested he before he had drawn Flaccus into dislike with his brother, upon this occasion: The inhabitants of Damasco, contending with the Sidonians about their demaines, and being to debate their cause before Flaccus; knowing what interest Agrippa had in him, they besought him that he would further their cause, promising him a great summe of money: whereupon he addressed himselfe in what he could to further those of Damasco. But Aristobulus, who had an inkling of this conclusion and promise, accused his brother to Flaccus; and after inquisition was made, and he found guilty of the fact, Agrippa grew out of the Presidents favour, and falling againe into extreme pover- tie, he came to Ptolemais; and for that he had no means of maintenance, he determined to faile into Italy. And for that he wanted money, he commanded Marsyas his free-man, that by all means whatsoever, he should seek to take up money upon interest. He spake unto Protus (who was Agrippas mothers free-man, who by the testament of his deceased Mistris was left unto Antonius protection) that upon his Masters bill and promise, he would lend him some money. But he alleadging that Agrippa before that time ought him money, extorted from Marsyas a bill of his hand, for twenty thousand Attique drachmes, deducting out of that summe two thousand and five hundred, which Marsyas took for himselfe: which he might the more easily doe, for that Agrippa could not otherwise chuse. Having therefore received this money, he went to Anthedon, where getting shipping he prepared himself for the journey.

But when Herennius Capito, who was treasurer of Jamnia, understood of his being there, he sent his souldiers unto him, to exact three hundred thousand silver drachmes at his hands, for which he stood indebted to Casars treasurer during his being at Rome, by which means he was enforced to stay. Whereupon he made a shew that he would obey their demand; but as soon as it was night, he caused the cables of the ship to be cut, and cast off, and sailed to Alexandria: there requested he Alexander Alabarcas to lend him two hundred thousand drachmes in silver. But he protested that he would trust him with nothing. But admiring Cyprus his wives constant love towards her husband, and her many other vertues, he upon her promise accorded to doe him kindnesse: whereupon in present money he payed him five talents in Alexandria, and promised to deliver him the rest of the money at Puteol, fearing Agrippas unthriftinesse. Thus Cyprus having furnished her husband for his journey into Italy, returned her selfe and her children into Judaea by land. But Agrippa, as soon as he arrived at Puteol, wrote unto Tiberius Caesar, who lived at Capreas, signifying unto him that he came to doe his duty, beseeching him that he would grant him free and favourable access. Tiberius with all expedition returned him a very kinde answer, certifying him that he would be very glad to see him safely arrived in Capreas. In a word, as soon as he was arrived, Cesar exprest and made it known, that his affection was answerable to his letters, and both embraced him and lodged him. The next day Cesar received letters from Herennius Capito, who advertised him that Agrippa ought three hundred thousand drachmes of silver, which he borrowed and paid not at the time prefixed, and that at such time as the appointed time of payment was come, he was fled out of the countrey, and place of his procuration, and by this occasion had deprived him of the means to constrain him to make satisfaction. When Cesar had read the letters, he was sore displeased, and commanded those of his chamber, that they should not admit Agrippa to his presence, untill such time as he had discharged that debt.

But he, nothing dismayed at Casars displeasure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the summe of three hundred thousand drachmes, to the end he might not lose Casars friendship. Who remembering her Berenice Agrippas mother, and with what familiaritie they had conversed together, and how Agrippa likewise had been brought up with Claudius her sonne, lent him that money: Whereupon he paying the debt, without any contradiction enjoyed the Princes favour, and was so reconciled to Cesar, that he committed his nephew to Agrippas charge, commanding him to attend him alwaies, whithersoever he went. Being by this benefit bound and tied to Antonia, he began to reverence her nephew Cain, who was gracious in all mens eyes, and honoured in memory of his parents. At that time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritane, Casars free-man, of whom he borrowed ten hundred thousand drachmes of silver, and paid Antonia her due, and kept the rest the more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with most inward familiarity, it hapned one day that riding in the same Coach with him, Agrippa wisht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might shortly surrender the kingdome and Empire unto Caius, who was each way more worthy then he. These words of his were overheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippas freeman; who for that time spake not a word thereof. But being afterwards accused for stealing Agrippas garment (as he indeed had done) and brought back again after he had fled away to Piso (who was the Prefect of the citie) he asked him why he fled: who answered, that he had certain secrets which he desired to reveale unto Cesar, that appertained to his profit and safety: for which cause he was sent by him in bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatory manner, wherein no king or tyrant ever equalled him, held him prisoner. For neither did he presently admit any Embassadors, neither sent he successors to those, who were Governours, & Prefects of his provinces, when the former were dead; and no lesse negligent was he in yeelding audience to his prisoners. But when his friends at any time questioned with him, why he used these accustomed delays; he answered them, that he deferred the Embassadors after that sort, for fear lest if he should speedily dispatch them, they should instantly return with new, whereby it should come to passe, that he should be continually troubled in entertaining and dismissing them.

And as touching his officers, he left them in their hands, to whom he had committed them, in regard of his subjects welfare. For naturally all magistracy is subject to avarice: but in especiall strangers induce those, who exercise the same to gather, and ingrosse the more instantly, when as the time of their authoritie is short and of small assurance; whereas if they should continue in the same for a long time, in regard of the gain they had made, and the much profits they had raised, they would be afterwards lesse greedy to extort further. Now if he should send others to succeed them on a sudden, it were impossible for him to content them, notwithstanding their many bribes: whereas in giving them time to fill their purses, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious desire of lucre which they affected before. And to this purpose he told them an example of a poore man that was a Lazar, to whose wounds a great number of flies assembled themselves, and covered the same: at sight whereof some by fortune arriving there, and having compassion of his misery, and supposing that the cause why he repulsed them not, proceeded from his disabilitie, approached neer to help him; but he required them to let him alone. Whereupon they demanding the cause wherefore he that was hurt refused to be delivered from so irksome an evill, he answered them, for that they should doe him more wrong, if those flies were driven away; for that being already full of blood, they prick me not (said he) neither suck me so earnestly, but give me some ease; whereas if now should alight on my wound which were hungry, & should seize my flesh in that desperate estate that I am, they would procure my death. For these causes he said; that seeing his subjects already consumed by so many exactions, he thought it a good policy in him, and a better provision for them, not to send them new Governours continually, who might after the maner of flies suck them to the quick, especially if to their inbred covetousnesse he should annex the feare of their sudden displacing. Now to approve that to be true which I have declared of Tiberius disposition, this action of his may suffice to justifie me. For having been Emperour for the space of twenty two yeers, all those Governours which he sent into Jewry were two, namely Gratus and Pilate his successor, neither demeaned he himself otherwise towards the rest of his subjects of the Empire.

And as touching his prisoners, the reason why he delayed so much to give them audience, was, to the end that they who had been condemned to death, should not speedily be delivered from those torments, wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deserved by their wickednesse. For whilest he kept them in that pain, their mis-hap increased the more. For this cause Eutychus could not obtain audience at his hands; but was long time detained prisoner. Afterwards in proceesse of time, Tiberius transported himself from Capreas to Tusculanum, which was distant from Rome some hundreth furlongs. There did Agrippa sollicite Antonia, to cause Eutychus to be called to his answer, as touching the accusation which he pretended against him. Now Antonia was in great favour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinitie that was between them (in that she was Drusus wife, who was Tiberius brother) as in respect of her modestie. For she being young continued in her widowhood, and would not marry with any other, notwithstanding Augustus importuned her to wed; but lived alwaies in honour without blame. Besides that, she had done Tiberius a great pleasure: for at such time as Sejanus his friend, and a man in great account in those daies (by reason he had the govern-

A ment of the army) practised a conspiracie against him, whereunto divers of the Senate, and of his freemen, and his men of war likewise were accessory: yet brought she all their intents to nothing. This attempt had taken a great head, and Sejanus had finished his purpose, had not Antonia used more advised courage, then Sejanus did in executing his treason. For having discovered the danger that threatned Tiberius, she wrote and sent her expresse letters by Pallas one of her trusty servants unto him to Capri, certifying him in particular the whole proesse of the conspiracie. Cesar having true understanding thereof, caused Sejanus and his confederates to be executed. Although therefore that before that time he honored Antonia greatly, yet did he afterwards honour her farre more; in such sort as he trusted her in all things. When as therefore she entreated him to give Eurychus audience: Tiberius answered, If, said he, Eurychus hath falsely objected any thing against Agrippa, it sufficeth that he endure that punishment which I have enjoyned him. But if in the torture he maintain that which he hath spoken to be true, it is to be feared lest Agrippa intending to punish his free-man, do rather heap the punishment upon his own head. When Antonia had reported this answer of his to Agrippa, he did the more instantly sollicite her, requiring her that the matter might be brought to triall. And for that Agrippa ceased not to importune her, Antonia took the occasion, which was this: Tiberius being after dinner time carried in his litter, and having Caius and Agrippa before him, she walking foot by foot by the litter, besought him to call Eurychus to his triall: whereunto he replied: The gods (said he) know, that that which I do, I do it not of mine own will, but for the necessitie I am pressed with upon your request: and having spoken thus, he commanded Macron Sejanus successour to bring Eurychus before him: which was performed with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to say against him, who had enfranchised him? My sovereign (said he) Caius that is here present, and Agrippa rode one day together in the same Coach, and I sat at their feet. After divers discouries held between them, Agrippa began to speak after this maner unto Caius; O, said he, would God the day were come wherein the old man departing out of this world, would make you governour thereof. For his sonne Tiberius would be no hindrance unto you, for him might you make away. Then should the world be happy, and I likewise have my share in the felicitie. Tiberius esteeming this his accusation to be true, and having of long time conceived a grudge against Agrippa, for that notwithstanding he had commanded him to honour Tiberius, who was his nephew, and Drusus sonne; Agrippa had given small regard to his commandment, and had not honoured him, but was wholly addicted unto Caius. For which cause said he to Macron, binde me this fellow. He scarcely understanding that which he spake, and no wayes suspecting that he should give that commandment in respect of Agrippa, deferred the performance untill such time as he might more exactly understand his minde. When as therefore Cesar turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (said he) Macron, whom I have commanded to be bound; and demanding of him once more by whom he spake: It is Agrippa, said he. Then had Agrippa recourse to submissive and humble prayers, refreshing the memory of his sonne with whom he had been brought up, and alleadging the education he had used towards his nephew Tiberius: but he prevailed nothing, but was led away bound in those purple ornaments which he then wore.

At that time it was very hot weather, and being in distresse of wine, he was extremely thirsty and distressed, yea more then became one of his quality. Whereupon espying Thaumastus one of Caius servants, who carried water in a pitcher, he required him to give him drink: which when he had willingly bestowed on him, he drank, and afterwards said unto him, This service thou hast done me in giving me drink, shall do thee good one day. For as soon as I shall escape out of these bonds, it shall not be long before I obtain thy liberty at Caius hands, for that thou hast not neglected to do me service in this my imprisonment, as thou hast beforetime done me whilest I was in my prosperity and dignity: Neither deceived he the mans expectation of his promise, but rewarded and gratified him. For afterwards, when he had obtained the kingdome, he begged Thaumastus libertie at Caius hands, & made him superintendent of his affairs, and after his decease he gave order that he should serve in the same place, with his sonne Agrippa and his daughter Bernice; so that he died very old, and much honoured. But this hapned afterward. But at that time Agrippa stood before the place bound with other companions, who were likewise in bonds: and through the grief he conceived, he leaned against a certain tree, on which there sat an Owle. One of those prisoners, who was by nation a German, beholding that bird, asked the souldier that was fettered with him, who he was that was apparellled in purple: and understanding that his name was Agrippa, and that he was a Jew, and one of the nobility of that nation, he required the souldier;

dier, who to the end to guard him was chained with him, to suffer him to draw neer unto Agrippa, and to have a little conference with him, for that he had a great desire to ask him of certain things concerning the customes of his countrey. Which when he had obtained, and having got neer him, he certified him by an interpreter of that which followeth: Young man (said he) the sudden change that hath befallen thee at this present, afflicteth and oppresseth thee with great and grievous torment; neither wilt thou easily beleewe that thou shalt escape from thy misery: yet so doth the divine providence dispose all things, that thou shalt shortly be delivered. Know therefore, and I swear unto thee by the gods both those of mine ancestors, and those also, who have residence and presidence in this place, and who have procured us this iron chain, that I will tell thee all, not to yeeld thee pleasure by my vain discourse, or to entertain thee with fruitlesse consolation; knowing well that when these predictions shall happen to fail, they will breed thee more sorrow, then if thou hadst never heard of them. But I have thought it good, yea although it were with mine own danger, to declare unto thee the predictions of the gods. It cannot otherwise be, but that shortly thou shalt be delivered from these bonds, and shalt be advanced to great honour and power, so that those, who at this day have compassion of thy calamity, shall bear envy to thy glory, and thou shalt depart this life in great felicitie, and shalt leave thy children mighty possessions. But bear this in thy remembrance, that when thou shalt see this bird once more, thou must needs die within five dayes after. These are those things which the gods think meet to foretell thee by this bird. As for my self, I have supposed that I should do thee wrong, if I should conceal this prediction from thee, having the foreknowledge thereof. I have therefore thought good to impart this joy unto thee, whereby thorow hope of thy future profit, thou mayest more easily endure thy present misfortune: for which cause I beseech thee, that as soon as thou shalt be partaker of this thy felicitie, thou wilt endeavour thy self to deliver us also from these adversities.

This presage of the German seemed so ridiculous to Agrippa, as it afterwards deserved most mighty admiration. But Antonia being sore grieved at the young mans calamitie, thought it not onely a difficult matter for her to entreat Tiberius for him, but altogether unprofitable in regard she should be repulsed: yet wrought she so much with Macron, that he was committed to the custody of such souldiers, who were of more reconciled behaviour, and had a Centurion appointed to keep him, that suffered him to use his daily bathings, and gave his friends and servants leave to visit him, by whose service and kindnesse his necessities might be relieved. His friend Silas also was admitted to speak with him, and amongst his free-men Marfynus and Stichus, who brought him in such meats as he was delighted withall, and coverings under colour to sell them: which by the permission of the souldiers, who had no lesse direction from Macron, they spread by night for him to take his rest upon. See here the estate wherein Agrippa lived in prison for the space of six moneths. But Tiberius being returned to Capreas, began at first to be attainted with a certain lingering disease, and for that his sicknesse increased more and more, he began to conceive a sinister hope of himself, and commanded Enodius, whom he most honoured amongst all his free-men, to bring him his sonnes, because he intended to talk with them before he died. But the sooth is, that he had not any children of his own, but had adopted them. For Drusus, who was his onely childe, was already dead, and had left behinde him a sonne called Tiberius, surnamed Gemellus. He had Caius also, his brother Germanicus sonne, who was in the flower of his age, and had travelled very diligently in good disciplines. To him also the people ascribed very much, in remembrance of the vertues of his deceased father, and as touching himself, he was of a sweet conversation, and so modest, that he was familiar and conversant with all men. Whereby it came to passe, that not onely the people, but the Senate also held him in great estimation, as also all the subjects in every severall Province. For they that spake with him, were drawn partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they saw in him: so that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitedly lamenting his losse, but with unfained sorrow; for that there was not any one that supposed not his death to be every mans particular losse. He therefore demeaned himself so modestly towards all men, that his sonne after his death was highly advanced thereby. For among the rest the men of warre made their reckning that although it should cost them their lives to get him the Empire, they would not refuse the hazard.

After that Tiberius had charged Enodius to bring him the two young men the next morrow by break of day, he besought the gods of that place to give him an evident signe whereby he might know who should succeed him: For although he desired to leave the Empire to his sonnes sonne, yet made he more account of that which God should make manifest unto him. He

He therefore conceived a presage, that he, who the next day should enter first to salute him; it should be he, who in the Empire should necessarily succeed him. And having settled this thing in his fantasie, he sent unto his little sonnes Master, charging him to bring him unto him by break of day, supposing that God had ordained that the Empire should be his: but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, he commanded Enodur, that as soon as he might, and as soon as the day should arise, he should suffer him of the two young Princes to enter in unto him, who should arrive the first. He walking out, met with Caius before the chamber door (for Tiberius was not there, who being ignorant of that which his grandfather thought, was busie about his breakfast) and said unto him, that the Emperour his father called for him, and withall suffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, he suddenly began to consider upon the power of God, who deprived him of the means to dispose of the Empire, according as he had determined with himself, for that it lay not in his power: and he lamented greatly, not so much for that he saw his deliberation could not be brought to effect, as for that his sonne Tiberius was distated of the Roman Empire; and besides that, was in danger of his life. For he made reckning that they, who were more stronger then he, would not suffer him to converse among them; and that alliance could not assure him his life: for sometimes for fear, and otherwhiles for hatred, some one would accuse him, that he went about and busily sought to seize the Empire; or that he had complotted some stratagem, lest he should lose the Empire with his life. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Astrologically predictions and nativities, so that the greater part of those things which he executed in all his life-time, was ordered thereby.

He seeing Galba one day coming towards him, spake this of him to certain of his familiars: Behold the man that shall be one day honoured with the Roman Empire. And amongst all the Emperours, he gave greatest credit to divination, for that in certain things he had found the conjectures correspondent to truth. But at that time he was grievously disquieted, by reason of the misfortune that had happened; yea he was in such sort grieved, as if his grand-child had been already lost, and he blamed himself for that he had sought these presages: for that he might have died without falling into that disaster, in being ignorant of that which was to come: whereas now he should die in the knowledge of their mis-haps whom he loved most intirely. Being thus troubled to see that the soveraigntie of the Empire should contrary to his intencion fall into their hands, who by his will should not enjoy the same; although it were with hearts grief and contrary to his will, yet spake he to Caius after this maner which ensueth: My sonne, although Tiberius be more neerly allied unto me then you are; yet notwithstanding both by mine own advice, as also by the will of the immortall Gods, I commit unto your hands the Empire of the Romans. I require you therefore that when you shall enjoy the same, you forget not the good will I have born towards you, who have established you in so high and worthie a dignitie; and charge you likewise that you forget not your Cousin Tiberius; but knowing that by the will of the gods I am he, who after them am the author of so many goods, which have befallen you, you return me the like good will and affection: and that you likewise take care of Tiberius, by reason of your mutuall alliance: for you ought to know that Tiberius serveth you for a bulwark to maintain your Empire, and your own life; and if he die, it will be the beginning of your mis-hap. For it is a perillous matter for those, who are raised to high dignities, to be sole and without allies. Furthermore, the gods do never leave them unpunished, who attempt or act any thing against the laws of consanguinitie. These were the last words which Tiberius spake to Caius, who promised him to perform all that which he required, notwithstanding he meant nothing lesse. For incontinently after he was installed in the Empire, he caused Tiberius to be made away, berhinking him of those divinations: as also the same Caius died anon after by a conspiracie that was practised against him. When that Tiberius had declared Caius his successeur in the Empire, he lived not many dayes after, and died after he had governed twentie two years, five moneths, and three dayes. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

The Romans having intelligence of Tiberius death, greatly rejoyced at the good news; yet durst they not assure themselves: and though of long time they would have willingly redeemed the truth of these reports with a good summe of money; yet feared they lest the news should be false, and lest if they shewed themselves too diligent in expressing their signes of joy, they should afterwards be accused for it, and lose their lives thereby. For onely Tiberius had done much mischief to the noble families in Rome, being of himself a man cholericke, implacable towards all men without any occasion: having a naturall inclination so cruell, that the easiest pain whereunto he adjudged those whom he condemned, was death: notwithstanding notwithstanding therefore that each man took pleasure to hear the news, yet did each one conceal it, untill such time as they might be more fully assured, through the fear of those miseries they foresaw, if the matter should fall out otherwayes. But Marfyas Agrippa free-man, having certain notice of Tiberius death, ranne speedily to comfort his Master Agrippa, with these good news, and meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a signe unto him, and told him in the Hebrew tongue, the Lyon was dead. Agrippa conceiving that which he meant, was ravished with joy, and said unto him: I will requite thee for all those benefits I have received at thy hands, and especially for this good news, provided that it prove true. The Centurion, who had the keeping of Agrippa, considering what expedition Marfyas had used in running, and the pleasure that Agrippa had conceived in his report, he began to suspect some alteration, and asked him what had happened: and whereas he delayed to give him an answer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainly what he had heard, in that he had grown already into inward familiarity with him. The Centurion rejoyced at his news, as well as Agrippa, hoping to speed the better thereby, and made Agrippa good cheer: but whilest they were in the midst of their banquetting, and drunk freely; there came one unto them, who told them that Tiberius was alive, and that within few dayes he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this news, for that he had committed a capitall crime in eating in the company of a prisoner, upon the news of Casars death, and by rejoycing with him, he drave Agrippa out of the place where he sate, and reproachfully said unto him: Thinkest thou (said he) that I know not how falsely thou spreadest rumour of Casars death? yes, be assured thou shalt answer thy lie with the losse of thy head. This said, he caused Agrippa to be bound, whom before-time he had suffered to go at libertie; and shut him up in more close prison, then he had been before: so that Agrippa was all that night long in this extreme miserie. The next day the rumour was spread thorow the whole Citie, that confirmed Tiberius death, and at that time everie one boldly protested it. There were some also, who offered sacrifices for this cause, and there came letters also from Caius, which were addressed to the Senate, by which he certified them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. He wrote another also to Piso, who had the guard of the Citie, containing the like report: and besides that commanding him to transerre Agrippa from the company of those souldiers, by whom he was kept, to the same place where he was lodged before; so that from that time forwards, he waxed confident. For although he was as yet a prisoner, yet lived he at his own discretion. Caius arriving in Rome, brought with him Tiberius body, which he burned most magnificently, according to the custome of the countrey. And although he were very willing to deliver Agrippa the same day; yet was he dissuaded from the same by Antonia, not for any ill will she bare the prisoner, but in regard of Caius honour, lest thereby he should shew himself to be glad of Tiberius death, in setting him at libertie so speedily, whom he had committed to prison. When as therefore some few dayes were over-past, he sent for him to his house, and caused him to be powld, and his garments changed, and that done, he set a Diadem upon his head, and made him King of Philips Tetrarchy, to which he annexed Lysanias Tetrarchy, and changed his chain of iron, into a chain of gold of the same weight, and sent Marullus into Judæa to govern there. The second yeer of Caius reign, Agrippa asked licence to repair into Judæa, to the intent he might dispose of his kingdome, purposing to return again at such time as he had dispatched those affairs. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Judæa, and was seen and saluted for a King beyond all mens expectation, serving thereby for a most notable example unto men, to expresse unto them how great the power of destiny is in humane affairs, considering the poore estate wherein he had been before, and the happinesse which he enjoyed at that time. Some termed him happie, in that he resolutely followed his hopes, other some could scarcely beleve that he was in this sort advanced.

HEROD the Tetrarch banished.

Herodias Agrippas sister was married to Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee and Perna. She envied her brother to see him raised to so great authoritie, and to farre greater dignitie then her husband enjoyed. For which cause she was displeased, that her brother, who fled out of his countrey in that he wanted means to pay his debts, was returned in

A in great honour and with greater substance. This charge endured she with great hearts grief, especially, at such time as she saw him apparelled like a King, and environed with a great multitude of people, and impossible was it for her to hide the bitterness of her grief, for which cause she incited her husband and perswaded him to make a voyage to Rome, and to purchase as much as he possessed. For, said she, I cannot endure to live, if Agrippa Aristobulus sonne condemned to death by the sentence of his own father (so poore and indigent, that to redresse his necessities wherewith he was daily pressed by his creditors, he was constrained at last to flee to Rome) should return with such titles of a King, and that her husband who was a Kings sonne, and was called to the kingdome by his father, should live obscure, and passe his life like a private man: Husband (said she) if heretofore it hath been no prejudice to thee to live in lesse dignitie, then erst thy father hath done; now at leastwise desire that

B due honour which belongeth to thy familie: neither think it to be sufferable to subscribe to him in estimation, who in times past hath been maintained by thy bounty. Neither suffer it to be thought (through thine own sloth) that he in his necessitie had better means and industrie to obtain an ample fortune, then you amidst your mightie abundance; as if it redounded not to thy shame to be thought inferiour to him at this time, who not long since, except by thy mercy, had no means to live. Let us therefore hastily repair unto Rome, and neither spare gold, silver, or any other expence, for that it availeth us not so much to keep the same, as to imploy the same in the purchase of a kingdome. But Herod dissuaded her as much as he might, for that he contented himself to live in quiet, and suspected the confusion that was at Rome, which he endeavoured as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias.

C But the more negligent she saw him, the more instantly incited she him to seek out the kingdome, and never gave she him over, untill she had conformed him to her desire: Whereunto he the rather listned, in that she might not be drawn from her resolution. Having therefore furnished himself after the most magnificent manner, and spared no cost, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his wife with him. Agrippa smelling their intent and the preparation they made, made his provision likewise. And having notice that they were put to sea, he sent Fortunatus one of his freemen to Rome, with presents to the Emperour, and certain letters against Herod, with commission to certifie Caius of every particular, according as the occasion should serve. He embarking himself after Herod, had a happy passage, and was onely prevented by him, but for the space that Herod presented himself to Caius: for he incontinently

D followed him, and delivered his letters. For they arrived at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a village of Campania, distant from Puteol some five stades, enriched with most royall and sumptuous palaces, for that every Emperour enforced himself to exceed the honour of his predecessour, by reason of the hot baths that naturally issued out of the earth, serving both for the health of the body, and recreation of the spirits. Whilest Caius talked with Herod in that he visited him first, he received Agrippas letters, containing Herods accusations, for they accused him of a conspiracie made and complotted betwixt him and Sejanus, since the beginning of Tiberius Empire: And how for the present he favoured Artabanus King of the Parthians to the prejudice of the Emperour Caius: of this, the preparations Herod had stored up in his Arsenals, gave evident testimony, which were sufficient to arm seventy thousand men of warre. Caius was sore moved with these informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him touching his warlike preparation, was true. He unable to contradict the same in any thing, for fear he should be convicted of falshood, avowed no lesse. Whereupon Caius supposing the accusation of his revolt to be sufficiently approved, deprived him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippas kingdome, bestowing Herods substance also upon him. He banished him likewise for ever, and confined him in the Citie of Lions in France: and understanding that Herodias was Agrippas sister, he gave her all that which in right appertained unto her. And supposing that she would not willingly accompany her husband in that his calamitie, he told her that her brother should be her warrant. But she gave him this reply: Mightie Emperour, you speak magnificently, and as it well becometh so great a Majestie, but there is a cause that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bounty, which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I bear unto my husband, whom if I should forsake in this his miserie, it would very ill becom me, in that I have been a partner with him in his felicitie. Caius displeased with this her resolute answer, banished her likewise with her husband, and gave the confiscation of her estate also to Agrippa. God did after this manner punish Herodias, in regard of that envy which she had conceived against her brother, and plagued Herod, in that he had so lightly listned to the foolish perswasions of a woman. But Caius governed the Empire, the first and second yeer of his reign, with most noble directions, behaving himself graciously towards all men, whereby he obtained the

One of theſe Embaſſadors of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Jews with many outrages, and amongſt other things he alleadged that they made no reckning of honouring Cæſar: And that whereas all other ſubjects of the Romane Empire had erected Altars and Temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had received him as a God, the Jews ſuppoſed it to be a diſhonour for them to honour his ſtatues, or ſwear by his name. After that Appion had urged many things and inveighed grievouſly againſt the Jews, hoping that Caius would be provoked againſt them, as in all likelihood and appearance it ſhould have falne out, Philo, the chiefeſt among the Embaſſadours of the Jews, a man of a famous memorie, and brother to Alexander Alabarcha, being experienced in Philoſophy, enforced himſelf to answer thoſe accuſations which were urged againſt the Jews. But Caius commanded him ſilence, and willed him inſtantly to withdraw himſelf, and was ſo fore diſpleaſed, that it appeared very manifeſtly, that he intended ſome hainous revenge againſt them. BUT Caius, being fore diſpleaſed for that the Jews onely deſpiſed his ordinances, ſent Petronius into Syria to ſucceed Viſellius in his roome, charging him with a ſtrong army to invade Judæa; and if they willingly admitted his ſtatue, that then he ſhould place it in the Temple of God; but if they denied the ſame, then, that over-coming them by warre, he ſhould enforce them to condeſcend thereunto. As ſoon as Petronius came into Syria, he endeavoured himſelf to ſatiſſie *Cæſar*s command: and having aſſembled as great an army as he could poſſibly levie, and leading forth with him two legions of Romane ſouldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending upon the firſt ſpring to invade Judæa. All which he ſignified to Caius by his letters: who commending him for his induſtry, adviſed him to uſe all expedition therein, and to make warre againſt thoſe who ſhould diſobey his commandments. Mean-whiles divers thouſands of the Jews reſorted to Petronius, who ſojourned at Ptolemais, beſeeching him not to conſtrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their laws, or to tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their fore-fathers. For if (ſaid they) you have wholly decreed to bring and erect this ſtatue in our Temple, firſt deprive us of our lives: and afterwards do that which ſhall ſeem good in your eyes. For it is impoſſible for us, as long as our ſouls remain within our bodies, to permit that which is forbidden by our laws, or to ſuffer ſuch impiety in regard of that honour, which we owe unto our Law-maker, and our predeceſſours who have ratified our laws to the intent we ſhould increaſe in vertue. Petronius enraged at this their proteſtation, answered thus: If I were Emperour, and of mine own minde enterprized this action, you had reaſon to uſe theſe kinds of inſinuations unto me. But ſince Cæſar hath ſent me this Commiſſion, there is no contradiction, but that I muſt obey his decrees: For if you reſiſt the ſame, you ſhall endure a moſt ſevere and rigorous puniſhment for your diſobedience and contumacy. Hereunto the Jews answered: My Lord (ſaid they) ſince your pleaſure is ſuch, as you will not in any ſort tranſgreſſe the command and contents of *Cæſar*s letters, neither will we any wayes violate or infringe the preſcript of our law, under hope of the divine aſſiſtance, and in imitation of the vertue of our anceſtors: For we are not ſo faint-hearted, that under hope of a vain and untimely deſire of life, we ſhould break thoſe laws which Almighty God hath propoſed unto us, under the reward of eternall felicitie: for which cauſe we will endure all fortunes whatſoever; ſo as our countrey law and religion may remain inviolate, and we are ready

A readie to encounter any misfortune, under hope that God will assist us; for whose honour we fear not to adventure on any danger. This had we rather do, then by obeying thee through cowardise, to incurre perpetuall ignominy; and that which is more, Gods wrath in neglect of his laws, whose authoritie, even in thine own judgement, is more to be regarded then Caius commission. Petronius conjecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiving he could not do for Caius what he expected in the erection of his statue, without great bloodshed; whereby much murder and inconvenience might follow, he took certain of his neereft and dearest friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conveniently and circumspectly look into the Jews actions. They, fearing some imminent danger through the warres they expected from the Romanes, and greater mischief through the breach of their laws, assembled once more many thousands of them, & met with Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him that he would not inforce them to that necessitie, nor defile their sacred City with forbidden images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (said he) will you fight with Cæsar, without regard either of his abilitie or your own weaknesse? We will not fight (said they) but we will rather die then depart from our laws. Whereupon prostrating themselves, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertain their deaths. In these tearms continued they for the space of fourty dayes, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefeft seed-time. For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death then to admit the statue. Whilest the matter stood upon these tearms, Aristobulus, Agrippas brother, and Elcias surnamed the Great, accompanied with divers of their household train, and some of the chiefeft among the Jews, came unto Petronius, beseeching him that he would consider the obstinacie of the people: neither give them occasion to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that he would write unto Caius, with what obstinacie the people refused the dedication of his image in the Temple: and how giving over the care of their husbandry, they prepared themselves for the warre, without any trust or confidence in their own strength, being rather addressed to die, then to suffer so great an indignity to be offered to their religion. Besides, how giving over their tillage, there was nothing to be expected but robbery, whereas they should want means to pay their customes, by which means they hoped that Cæsar would be moved to moderate his severity towards that nation, and not to give them cause of rebellion: and that if he might not be moved from the prosecution of the warre, that then he might go forward with his businesse. This was the effect of Aristobulus request.

But Petronius, partly in respect of their prayers who instantly urged him, and the weightinesse of the action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Jews, supposing that it was a matter unworthy a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfie Caius unbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the fear of God, and remorse of his own conscience, he had rather to his own danger inform the Emperour of the absurditie of the matter by his letters, being no wayes ignorant of his wrathfull spirit and forwardnesse in revenge, except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he; that although it altered not his resolution, but haply inforce't his displeasure against him, in that he speedily executed not his command; yet that it was the dutie of a good man, no, not to refuse an assured death, if so be he might save so guiltlesse and huge a multitude. When as therefore he had assembled the Jews together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) and disposed all those warlike forces that at that time gave attendance on him round about him, he told the Jews first of all, not his own, but the Emperours intent, who would have them shortly taste his displeasure, and enforce them to bear the burden of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himself, that it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours favour he had received so great honour, he should not commit any thing contrary to his command. I hold it (said he) a matter most just to imploy my life and honour for you, to the end that so huge a number of men should not be drawne into danger of death: and I will respect the excellencie of the laws of your fathers, for which you think you ought to entertain warre and danger: neither is it lawfull to suffer the Temple of God to be defiled by the authoritie of Princes. I will therefore write to Cæsar, and certifie him of your minds: and in all that I may, I will assist you to obtain your request. ND whereas there aroſe a ſedition betwixt the Jews and Grecians, that inhabited Alexandria, three choſen Embaſſadors on either ſide were ſent unto Caius. One of theſe Embaſſadors of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Jews with many outrages, and amongst other things he alleadged that they made no reckning of honouring Caſar: And that whereas all other ſubjects of the Romane Empire had erected Altars and Temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had received him as a God, the Jews ſuppoſed it to be a diſhonour for them to honour his ſtatues, or ſwear by his name. ## CHAP. XI.

Alias, cap. 19.
Caſar ſendeth Petronius into Syria, and commandeth him in ſpite of the Jews to plant his ſtatue in Gods Temple. The Jews repair to Ptolemais, beſeeching him that he would not bring his ſtatue into the holy City.

BUT Caius, being fore diſpleaſed for that the Jews onely deſpised his ordinances, ſent Petronius into Syria to ſucceed Vitellius in his roome, charging him with a ſtrong army to invade Judæa; and if they willingly admitted his ſtatue, that then he ſhould place it in the Temple of God, but if they denied the ſame, then, that over-coming them by warre, he ſhould enforce them to condeſcend thereunto. As ſoon as Petronius came into Syria, he endeavoured himſelf to ſatiſſie Caſar's command: and having aſſembled as great an army as he could poſſibly levie, and leading forth with him two legions of Romane ſouldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending upon the firſt ſpring to invade Judæa. All which he ſignified to Caius by his letters: who commending him for his induſtry, adviſed him to uſe all expedition therein, and to make warre againſt thoſe who ſhould diſobey his commandments. Mean-whiles divers thouſands of the Jews reſorted to Petronius, who ſojourned at Ptolemais, beſeeching him not to conſtrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their laws, or to tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their fore-fathers. For if (ſaid they) you have wholly decreed to bring and erect this ſtatue in our Temple, firſt deprive us of our lives: and afterwards do that which ſhall ſeem good in your eyes. For it is impoſſible for us, as long as our ſouls remain within our bodies, to permit that which is forbidden by our laws, or to ſuffer ſuch impiety in regard of that honour, which we owe unto our Law-maker, and our predeceſſours who have ratified our laws to the intent we ſhould increaſe in vertue. Petronius enraged at this their proteſtation, answered thus: If I were Emperour, and of mine own minde enterprized this action, you had reaſon to uſe theſe kinds of inſinuations unto me. But ſince Caſar hath ſent me this Commiſſion, there is no contradiction, but that I muſt obey his decrees: For if you reſiſt the ſame, you ſhall endure a moſt ſevere and rigorous puniſhment for your diſobedience and contumacy. Hereunto the Jews answered: My Lord (ſaid they) ſince your pleaſure is ſuch, as you will not in any ſort tranſgreſſe the command and contents of Caſar's letters, neither will we any wayes violate or infringe the preſcript of our law, under hope of the divine aſſiſtance, and in imitation of the vertue of our anceſtors: For we are not ſo faint-hearted, that under hope of a vain and untimely deſire of life, we ſhould break thoſe laws which Almighty God hath propoſed unto us, under the reward of eternall felicitie: for which cauſe we will endure all fortunes whatſoever, ſo as our countrey law and religion may remain inviolate, and we are ready

A readie to encounter any misfortune, under hope that God will assist us; for whose honour we fear not to adventure on any danger. This had we rather do, then by obeying thee through cowardise, to incurre perpetuall ignominy; and that which is more, Gods wrath in neglect of his laws, whose authoritie, even in thine own judgement, is more to be regarded then Caius commission. Petronius conjecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiving he could not do for Caius what he expected in the erection of his statue, without great bloodshed; whereby much murder and inconvenience might follow, he took certain of his neereff and dearest friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conveniently and circumspectly look into the Jewes actions. They, fearing some imminent danger through the warres they expected from the Romanes, and greater mischief through the breach of their laws, assembled once more many thousands of them, & met with Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him that he would not inforce them to that necessitie, nor defile their sacred City with forbidden images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (said he) will you fight with Cesar, without regard either of his abilitie or your own weaknesse? We will not fight (said they) but we will rather die then depart from our laws. Whereupon prostrating themselves, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertain their deaths. In these tearms continued they for the space of fourty dayes, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefeff seed-time. For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death then to admit the statue. Whilest the matter stood upon these tearms, Aristobulus, Agrippas brother, and Elcias surnamed the Great, accompanied with divers of their household train, and some of the chiefeff among the Jews, came unto Petronius, beseeching him that he would consider the obstinacie of the people: neither give them occasion to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that he would write unto Caius, with what obstinacie the people refused the dedication of his image in the Temple: and how giving over the care of their husbandry, they prepared themselves for the warre, without any trust or confidence in their own strength, being rather addressed to die, then to suffer so great an indignity to be offered to their religion. Besides, how giving over their tillage, there was nothing to be expected but robbery, whereas they should want means to pay their customes, by which means they hoped that Cesar would be moved to moderate his severity towards that nation, and not to give them cause of rebellion: and that if he might not be moved from the prosecution of the warre, that then he might go forward with his businesse. This was the effect of Aristobulus request.

But Petronius, partly in respect of their prayers who instantly urged him, and the weightinesse of the action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Jews, supposing that it was a matter unworthy a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfie Caius unbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the fear of God, and remorse of his own conscience, he had rather to his own danger inform the Emperour of the absurditie of the matter by his letters, being no wayes ignorant of his wrathfull spirit and forwardnesse in revenge, except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he; that although it altered not his resolution, but haply inforc't his displeasure against him, in that he speedily executed not his command; yet that it was the dutie of a good man, no, not to refuse an assured death, if so be he might save so guiltlesse and huge a multitude. When as therefore he had assembled the Jews together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) and disposed all those warlike forces that at that time gave attendance on him round about him, he told the Jews first of all, not his own, but the Emperours intent, who would have them shortly taste his displeasure, and enforce them to bear the burden of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himself, that it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours favour he had received so great honour, he should not commit any thing contrary to his command. I hold it (said he) a matter most just to imploy my life and honour for you, to the end that so huge a number of men should not be drawne into danger of death: and I will respect the excellencie of the laws of your fathers, for which you think you ought to entertain warre and danger: neither is it lawfull to suffer the Temple of God to be defiled by the authoritie of Princes. all torments both in body and spirit, to the end that I may not behold so many vertuous men, as you are, perish in your good and just actions. Go therefore each of you and ply your work, and till your lands: my self will send unto Rome, and both in my self and by my friends, I will imploy my self for you. After he had spoken thus, he dismissed the assembly, praying the chiefeft amongst them to encourage the husbandmen to ply their businesse, and to confirm the rest of the people in their good hope. Of himself also he ceased not to animate them. And truly God shewed his assistance to Petronius, and assisted him in all his affairs. For as soon as he had finished his discourse unto the Jews, there suddenly fell a great rain beyond all humane expectation. For the day was very fair, neither was there any appearance of rain in the ayre, and all that yeer long there was an extreme drought, so that men were past hope to have any moysture, notwithstanding that sometime there happened certain clouds in the heavens. At that time therefore the water fell in great abundance: and besides the expectation and opinion of men, the Jews conceived hope that Petronius, solliciting their cause, should not be repulsed. But Petronius was more amazed then all the rest, seeing evidently that God undertook the affairs of the Jews, and gave them testimony of his manifest assurance; so that they that were their professed adversaries, had no means to contradict them, as he himself wrote to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end he should not draw so many thousand men into a desperate resolution and unhappy death. For without warre it was impossible for him ever to make them forsake their religion. Furthermore, that he would not cut off and lose the renew which he received of that nation; and would not erect a trophy of an everlasting curse and malediction against himself. Adding moreover, what the ower of their God was: which he had so clearly declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his mercifull hand was over them. This is the content of Petronius letters.

On the other side, King Agrippa, who at that time conversed at Rome, grew more and more in favour with Caius, having entertained him at a banquet, wherein he enforced himself to exceed all others in sumptuousnesse, as in all other sorts of delights and pleasures, yea with such festivals entertained he him, that not onely others, but also the Emperour himself could not attaine to such magnificence; so much enforced he himself to exceed all others through the great desire he had to content and satisfie Caius in all things. Caius was abashed at this his courage and magnificence, seeing Agrippa enforce himself above his power and means to abound in silver; and all this to the intent to please him. For which cause Caius in requitall of his kindnesse, intending to honour Agrippa to his uttermost power, in granting him that which he most desired, being one day whet with wine, invited him to drink a carouse: adding these words; Agrippa, I have heretofore known the honour thou hast shewed towards me, and thou hast expressed the earnest affection that thou bearest me, in hazarding thy self in divers dangers, into which thou hast been drawn during Tiberius life-time; and hast omitted nothing, no, not in that which exceedeth thy power, to shew thy vertuous affection towards me. For which cause I think that it should be a great shame for me, if I should suffer my self to be overcome by thee in kindnesse, without some answerable correspondence: I will therefore put that in practise which I have heretofore omitted. For all those things that hitherto I have bestowed on thee, are of no reckning. My will is that thy ready vertue should at this present be required, by such means as might for ever make thee happy. Now he spake after this maner, hoping that Agrippa would beg some great Province at his hands, or the renewes of some Cities.

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet did he not discover his intent, but gave Caius this ready answer, that whereas he had served him to the dislike of Tiberius, it was not for the gain he expected heretofore, and for the present also he did nothing under hope to be rich, contenting himself that he was in the Emperours good favour. That the benefits he had received by him, were great, yea exceeding all that which he durst ever have hoped. For (said he) although they be but small in comparison of your Greatnesse, yet in respect of my self, who have received them, and in my conceit and qualitie, they are very great. Caius being amazed at this his courage, insisted the rather to perswade him, that he would grant him all that he would require at his hands. Whereupon Agrippa said: Dread Prince, since it is your good pleasure to think me worthis to be honoured by your presents, I will not request any thing at your hands that may tend to enrich me, for that by those goods you have already given me, I am greatly honoured: but I beseech and request one thing at your hands, which will purchase you the reputation of piety, and will procure God to be propitious unto you in all your actions; and which also will breed me much glory among those, who shall hear that I have not been refused in my demand, which concerneth me more then

A then the necessities of this life. I therefore beseech you that it will please you to give commandment, that that statue, which you have charged Petronius to erect in the Temple of the Jews, may never be advanced there. This was Agrippa's request, which to his great hazard he presented the Emperour with, knowing very well how perillous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life to demand any such thing at Caius hands, that was not answerable to his humour. Caius on the one side moved with the service Agrippa had done him, and on the other side seeing how great an indignitie it should be for him, if before such an assembly of witnesses, he should deny that which he had so instantly pressed Agrippa to request, as if he suddenly had repented himself, and admiring Agrippa's vertue (who having means within a little time to augment his particular estate, either by revenues or other commodities, had preserved the common cause, the laws of his countrey and piety before all these) he granted him his supplication, and wrote to Petronius, praising him for that he had used such diligence in assembling his armie, as also for all that whereof he had certified him, annexing these words: If (said he) you have already planted the statue, as I commanded you, let it remain in the place; but if it be not done, be thou no more troublesome to the Jews, but dismisst thine armie, and repair thou in person to that place whither I have sent thee. For I urge no more the erection of that statue for the desire that I have to gratifie Agrippa, whom I intirely honour, and in such sort, as it is impossible for me to contradict any thing whatsoever, that either he hath need of, or shall require. These were the contents of those letters, which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he understood that the Jews bethought them of revolt: for they made it known, that rather then they would endure the statue, they would hazard a warre against the Romanes: which when Caius understood, he was extremely sorrowfull: and being a man addicted to all villany, and estranged from all honesty, and who gave place to no good counsell, incontinently after he had conceived a displeasure against any man, and who likewise thought it a great good hap for him to accomplish all that whatsoever he pleased, he wrote again to Petronius to this effect: Since the Present which the Jews have given thee, have prevailed more with thee then my commandments have done, so as to please them, thou hast despised that which I have enjoined thee, I make thy self the Judge how much thou hast deserved to incur my displeasure, to the end that thou mayest serve for an example to all those, who shall come after thee, that an Emperours commandment ought not in any sort to be neglected. Although this Epistle was both written and sent, yet did not Petronius receive the same during Caius life-time, for that they that carried the same, were stayed by crosse winds; so that Petronius received those letters that certified him of Caius death, before he received the other. For God would not forget Petronius, who exposed himself to great dangers for the love of the Jews, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by Gods wrath being kindled against him, by reason that he affected divine honours, received his reward; and Petronius obtained favour both at Rome, and thorow all the whole government, and especially among the principall Senators, against whom Caius was accustomed to vomit his cholerick disgraces. He died a little after he had written the letter to Petronius, by which he threatned and denounced him death. Hereafter will I declare the cause why he was taken out of this world, and the maner how treason was plotted and wrought against him. The letter that brought tidings of Caius death, was delivered to Petronius first; and incontinently after he received that wherein he enjoined him to kill himself. He highly rejoyced at this his good hap, and Caius death, and admired Gods providence, who speedily and happily had rewarded him both for the honour that he bare unto his Temple, as also for the assistance he used towards the Jews. Behold how Petronius escaped from death, by an unexpected means.

ASINAEUS and ANITAEUS.

IN those dayes there happened a grievous commotion amongst those Jews that inhabited Mesopotamia and Babylon; and such slaughters and calamities as never the like hath been declared in our former narrations, which in that I intend to report both particularly and seriously, I willuppe up the whole cause thereof from his first originall. tude: Moreover, it was such as might be hardly invaded by the enemy, both for that the river Euphrates hemmed it in on one side, as also for that it was defended with very strong walls. Upon the same river also there stood another city, called Nisibis, in which the Jews, in respect of the strength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accustomed to offer unto God, and the rest of their votive money. These two Cities therefore served them for two store-houses: and from thence, according as time required, they sent the money they had gathered, to Jerusalem, and committed the convey thereof to divers thousands of men, for fear lest it should be taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the sovereignty in Babylon. Among these Jews lived Asinæus and Anilæus, two brethren, born in Nearda, whose father being dead, their mother set them and bound them to the weavers trade, for that amongst those Nations it was accounted no indignity to follow that trade: for both men and women exercise themselves therein. It happened, that their master with whom they learn'd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came somewhat late unto their work. They taking this chastisement of his as if a great injury had been done unto them, betook themselves to their weapons, whereof there were great store in that house, and retired themselves into a place where the flood divideth it self into two parts, which naturally abounded with excellent pastures, and such fruits as were reserved for the use of winter. To these men there flocked a number of needy persons, whom they armed and became their captains, and no man opposed himself against their insolent proceedings. Being by this means grown absolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themselves a strong fortresse, they sent unto the inhabitants, commanding them to pay them tribute for their cattell which they pastured; so that this tribute gave sufficient to entertain them, promising to those who obeyed them, all friendship, and that they would maintain them against all those that should injure them, of what place soever they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatened them that they would kill all their cattell. The inhabitants of the countrey, knowing themselves unable to crosse them, obeyed them, and sent them the number of cattell which they required, so that greater forces daily coupled themselves with them, and they grew of that power, that they could make their excursions against those whom they intended to hurt. Every one respected them, and they were feared by all men, so that their renown came at last to the ears of the king of Parthia.

The Governour of Babylon likewise intending to cut off this mischief before it grew to greater head, assembled as many men as he could possible, both Parthians and Babylonians, and marched forth against them, with an intent to root them out, before they should have any inkling thereof to prepare themselves for their defence. Having therefore prepared his army, he lay in ambush neer unto a marsh, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Jews forbear all kinde of work, he making his account that the enemy durst not make head against him, but without fight he should lead them away captives) he marched easily, thinking to charge them unawares. Asinæus, who at that time lay idly with his fellows, having his Arms fast by him: Ye men (said he) me thinks I hear the neighing of horses, not such as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreover, I hear the noise of their bridles, and I fear lest the enemies secretly stealing upon us, should circumvent us: let therefore some one of us go and discover what the matter is, and certifie us truly of that which he shall perceive: I would I were found a liar in that which I have told you. This said, one of them went out to espie what the noise intended, who running hastily back again, told him that he had not fully conjectured as touching the intent of the enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not suffer themselves any longer to be out-braved by them. He also declared, that there was a mightie number of horsemen, who were assembled like a drove of beasts, sufficient and able utterly to overcome Asinæus and all his company, forasmuch as they were not in a readinesse to defend themselves: for that our law forbiddeth us in any sort to travell on the Sabbath. Asinæus determined with himself not to do that which the Spy had said, but thought that it was better for them to behave themselves valiantly in that their necessitie wherein they were plunged, and that if they must needs die, it better became them to make breach of their law, then to hearten their enemies by their submission. He therefore presently betook himself to his weapons, and encouraged all those that were about him, to make it known in effect what their valour was. Whereupon all of them at once marched forth against the enemy, and slaughtered a great many of them, for that they, despising Asinæus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hold on men already vanquished, but in the end they were constrained to betake them to flight.

When

A When the bruit of this skirmish was brought to the ears of the King of Parthia, he was wholly astonish'd at the boldnesse of these two brethren, and he had a desire to see them, and to speak with them. He therefore sent one of the trustiest of his guard, to let them understand that although King Artabanus had been injured by them, in that they had invaded his countrey; notwithstanding said this Embassadour, he making lesse account of the displeasure he hath conceived against you, then of your vertue, hath sent me unto you to give you my hand and troth in his name for safe conduct and securitie in your voyage, requiring you to be his friends: he conditioneth therefore with you without any deceit or fraud, promising you gifts and honours, and determineth to increase your dignitie by his power. Asinans refused to enterprize this voyage, but sent his brother Anilans with certain presents, such as he could possibly finde. He therefore departed with the messenger, and presented himselfe before Artabanus; who seeing Anilans come alone, asked him how it hapned that Asinans came not with him: and understanding that he stayed in his marish through the fear that he had of him, he swore by the gods of his ancestors, that he would doe him no wrong, wishing them to give credit to his promise, and he stretched out his hand, which is the greatest sign which the Kings of that countrey use to assure those that parley with them. For after they have mutually given one another their hands, there is no sinister practice to be feared, and they from whom a man expecteth any harme, are no more to be feared at such time as they have given this testimony of assurance. That done, Artabanus sent back Anilans to perswade his brother Asinans to come to the Court. Artabanus did this, supposing that this his amitie with the two brothers would be a bridle for the Jews, who otherwise might encroach upon his governments. For, he feared lest if any rebellion should happen, and he should be troubled in that warre, Asinans and they of Babylon should grow more strong, both by the voluntary submission of the Jews, as by force: and thereby should doe him the more mischief. Upon this deliberation he sent Anilans, who easily perswaded his brother, giving him to understand among other things, what good will the King bare him, and the oath that he had sworn: so that both of them resorted to Artabanus, who received them very graciously, admiring Asinans vertue, who had so great a courage to exercise his enterprizes, considering especially that he was a man of low stature, and who to look on seemed to be contemptible: and he told his friends that without comparison, he had a greater heart than his body.

D And when as in banquetting he had named Asinans, and shewed him to Abdagasis the Generall of his army, signifying unto him with what valour these brethren were endowed in feats of arms, Abdagasis required that it might be lawfull for him to kill Asinans, to the end he might punish the wrongs he had done to the estate of the Parthians. Never (said the King) will I give my consent to betray a man, who hath committed himself to my protection, and hath given me his hand, and who buildeth upon the oath I have past unto him in the name of the gods. But if thou be a valiant man in feats of arms, thou hast no need to make me forswear my self, to the end I might do justice on him for his outrages committed against the Parthians: but at such time as he and his brother shall depart from hence, assail him, and overcome him by thy valour, provided that I be not privy to thy attempt. And afterwards calling Asinans to him in the morning: It is time (said he) that thou return homeward, for fear thou provokest divers of the Captains of my Court, which contrary to my will, will endeavour themselves to kill thee. I commit the countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard, which by thy care and vigilancie shall remain exempt from all robberies, and other such calamities. Reason it is that I procure thy good, because I have engaged mine honour and faith irrevocably unto thee, not upon any light matter, but for things that importune thee as neerly as thy life. This said, he gave him certain presents, and incontinently dismissed him. Now as soon as he returned home to his own fortresse, he fortified the places, both those which before-time he had thorowly defenced, as the other which as yet no man had attempted to strengthen: and in short time he grew to that greatnesse, as no one man of obscure fortune and beginning attained before him. Neither contented with the honours of the Babylonians, he was also held in great account by the Captains of the Parthians, who were sent to govern in the neighbouring Provinces: yea so much encreased his authoritie with his power, that all Mesopotamia was at his command. In this felicitie and encreasing glorie of his, he continued for the space of fifteen yeeres: which never began to wane untill such time as neglecting the ancient study of vertue, and contemning the laws of his fore-fathers, both he and his factious followers being devoured in pleasure, yielded themselves captive to forrain lusts. It fortun'd that a certain Governour of those Parthians came into that countrey, accompanied with his wife, not onely enriched and endowed with other perfections, but also admired for her incomparable comlineffe and beauty. Whom without ever seeing her, onely by respect of her beauty, Anileus, Asinurus brother loved entirely: and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtain her favour, neither had any other hope to enjoy the Lady, he could not bridle his unruly lust, but he made warre against her husband: and killing the Parthian in their first conflict, his wife became his, both in subjection and bed-service, which thing was the originall of many mighty calamities both to himself and towards his brother. For when as having lost her former husband, she was led away captive, she carried with her the images of the gods of her countrey, which she highly esteemed, according as it was the custome of those that inhabited that place, to have their gods whom they adored in their houses, whom at such time as they travell into a forrain countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and used them, according to the fashion of her countrey, at the first secretly: but after she was known for Anileus wife, then adored she them according to the custome, and with the same service which she used during her first husbands dayes, sacrificing to her gods.

Their chiefeft friends seeing this, first of all reproved them, for that Anileus committed such things, as were no wayes used among the Hebrews, and altogether repugnant to their laws, for that he had married a woman of a forrain nation, that contradicted and violated their accustomed religion: for which cause they advised them to beware, lest in submitting themselves too much to their unbridled pleasures, they should lose the honour and power they had received from God, even untill that present. But seeing their perswasions profited nothing, and that Anileus likewise had villainously slain one of his dearest friends, who had somewhat too freely reproved him (who at such time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeal of the laws of his ancestors, and with grief against his murderer, wished that Asinurus and Anileus and all their associates might die the like death: they, for that they were transgressors of the law; the other, for that they succoured not themselves in that oppression, which they suffered for the maintenance of their laws.) They were sore displeased: yet notwithstanding they contained themselves, calling to their remembrance that their felicitie proceeded from no other cause, but from the valour of those brethren.

But when they understood that the Parthian gods were adored by this woman, they be- thought them that it behoved them not any more to bear with Anileus, in contempt of their laws: for which cause, addressing themselves to Asinurus in great assemblies, they exclaimed against Anileus; saying, that he ought, although at first he had no power to dispose of himself, yet now at last, to correct this error before it should redound to their publike plague: for that both his marriage was disallowed in all mens eyes, as altogether contrary to their laws, and that the superstitious observance of the gods, which the woman presumed to use, was an apparant injurie offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his brothers fault would breed some great inconvenience, both to himself and his followers, yet being overcome with brotherly affection, he easily pardoned his brother, ascribing his error to the violence of his unbridled passion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations, and greater reproofs, at length he admonished his brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was past, and willing him to amend the error hereafter, by sending home the woman unto her kindred. Yet did this admonition of his take no effect with him; for that the woman perceiving that the rumour that was raised among the people was for her sake, and being afraid lest for her love sake Anileus should incur some danger, she poisoned Asinurus, to the end that her love being in authoritie, she might more freely practise her impietie. Now when Anileus had gotten the government into his own hands, he drew out his forces against certain villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the chiefeft among the Parthians, and Artabanus sonne in law, which villages he spoiled, and carried away moveables, men, sheep, and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was resident in those quarters, understood of the spoil of his villages, he was sore displeased, and the rather for that without any occasion or proffer of injurie, Anileus had assailed him in contempt of his estate, who was a chief Peer of the countrey: for which cause he incontinently assembled the greatest power of horse and footmen he could gather, to set upon Anileus and his associates. Leading his forces therefore against one of his villages, he kept himself in covert, to the end he might fight the next day, which was the Sabbath day, on which the Jews attempted not any thing. Whereof when Anileus was advertised by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in another village, who had exactly told him all Mithridates intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his souldiers; after he had made his souldiers take their refection, he departed by night, to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be advertised of his comming. He therefore rushed in upon them

A about the fourth watch of the night, & slew those whom he found asleep, and the rest being astonished hereat, were forced to save themselves by flight: he also took Mithridates prisoner, and caused him to be carried away naked on an Ass, which is one of the greatest disgraces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Having after this disgracefull manner carried him into a Forrest, some of his familiars perswaded him to kill him: but Anilaw told them incontinently, that they ought to deale with him farre otherwise; for that it behoved them not to kill a man, who was one of the chiefe among the nobilitie of the Parthians, and one who was most honoured in regard of that affinitie and alliance he had with the King: that although all that which heretofore had been offered to Mithridates, were insupportable; yet if they should be the means of the safegard of his life, he would remit the injuries, and remunerate them for their mercy in saving his life; whereas if they should deale severely with him, the King would seek his revenge, and make a horrible slaughter of all those Jews that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to have compassion of, both for that they are of their blood, as for that if any mischief should befall them, they knew not whither to retire themselves; whereas they might be assisted with the flower and picked number of the men of their nation. Having thus discoursed and debared the matter in the ears of his souldiers, his opinion was approved, and they were perswaded; and so Mithridates was sent back again.

C But no sooner returned he home unto his house, but that his wife hit him in the teeth, that he lived but by the mercy of his enemies notwithstanding he were the Kings sonne in law: that he had made no reckoning to punish those, who had so much injured him: that he likewise contented himselfe to have his life saved after he had been prisoner to the Jews. For which cause (said she) recover thou thy former vertue and honour, which thou hast heretofore lost, or I sweare by the gods of the King my father, that the bond of marriage which is betwixt thee and me, shall be dissolved.

D Mithridates, unable to indure these usuall reproaches, and on the other side, apprehending his wives hatighry courage, from whom he feared to be separated, he assembled the greatest power of men of warre that he could possible, notwithstanding it were against his will, and led them forth; supposing himselfe to be unworthy of life, if he who was by nation a Parthian, should be cowardly put to the worst by the Jews. When Anilaw understood that Mithridates came forth against him with a great force, he thought that it would rebound greatly to his indignitie, if he should lye lurking amidst his marshes; and hoping that he should have no worse fortune against his enemies, then he had at the first, and building much upon his souldiers, who were ever wont to get the upper hand in their encounters, he likewise drew forth his army: to them also certain other adjoynded themselves, who sought nothing else but pillage, and hoped that with their onely presence they might dismay their enemy.

E But after they had had marched about ninty stades, and passed thorow a countrey that was scant of water, and were about the heat of the midday travelled with thirst: Mithridates army came in sight, and charged them even at that time, when they fainted for want of drink, and thorow the extremitie of heat, so as they could scarcely wield their weapons. At that time Anilaw souldiers encountering with Mithridates fresh men, were shamefully put to flight: whereby it came to passe that a great number of them was murdered, and many thousand men put to the sword. But Anilaw himselfe, and all those of his company, retired themselves in great haste into a Forrest, leaving Mithridates Lord and Master of the field, whereof he was very joyfull. Notwithstanding this dyaster, an infinite number of lawlesse men resorted to Anilaw, who set little by their lives, provided there might no limit be proposed to their unbridled licentiousnesse; so that he gathered a greater number of men, then those whom he had lost: yet were they farre different in valour from the former: for they were men wholly ignorant of warlike discipline: notwithstanding, he being accompanied with these men, went and set upon certain boronghs of the Babylonians, which were wholly destroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cause, the Babylonians and his other enemies, sent unto Nearda to the Jews that were there, requiring that Anilaw might be delivered into their hands: whereunto condescending not (for although they had a will to performe their request, yet it lay not in their power to deliver him) they required that they might live in peace. And to intreat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians sent certain men to conferre with Anilaw. They having surveighed the place wherein Anilaw kept, assailed both himselfe and his followers by night, and slew all those they encountered with, without resistance, and amongst the rest Anilaw. When the Babylonians saw that they were delivered from the oppression of Anilaw, who till that time had been as it were a bridle unto them, to restrain and curbe the hatred they conceived against the Jews, with whom they had had oftentimes been at oddes, by reason of the contrariety of their religions, whereby it grew that they oftentimes fell at debate upon each opportunitie, wherein they met.

At that time there fore that Anilam men were discomfited, the Babylonians set upon the Jews on all sides; who seeing themselves in danger by reason of the insolence of the Babylonians, against whom they were too weak to make resistance, and on the other side unable to live amongst them, they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a City famous in regard of Seleucus the sonne of Nicanor, who builded it. In that City dwelt divers Macedons, divers Greeks, and a great number of Syrians. The Jews fled thither, and sojourned there about some five yeers, without any molestation: but in the sixth yeer, when the plague grew rise in Babylon, the Jews that remained there, were enforced to seek them some new habitation; and that remove of theirs into the City of Seleucia was the cause likewise of their further mischief, as I will make manifest. The Greeks who dwell in Seleucia, are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians, and have alwaies the upper hand; but after that the Jews came to inhabit in that place, in a certain sedition that arose among them, the Syrians had the upper hand, by the means of the Jews, who joynd their forces with theirs, who of themselves were valiant and good souldiers.

The Greeks had been repulsd in this tumult, seeing they had but one onely means left them to maintain their former honour, but to break that league of friendship which was between the Syrians and the Jews, devised in private each one with those Syrians, with whom the were acquainted, promising to live in peace and amitie with them, whereunto they condescended willingly. For the chiefeft of these two nations concluded the peace, which presently after followed, to the end that on both parts they should joyne in hatred against the Jews. So that altogether charging them at unawares, they slew more then fifty thousand of them: and all of them were slain, except some few, who through the mercy of their friends, and warrantize of their neighbours were suffered to escape. These retired themselves to Ctesiphon a City of Greece, that was not farre from Seleucia, where the King sojourneth every yeer, and keepeth the greatest part of his moveables; hoping in that place through the reverence of the King they might remain in more safety and securitie. All the nation of the Jews that were in these quarters stood in great fear: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Assyrians of that countrey, accorded amongst themselves to make a generall warre against the Jews; wherey it came to passe that they assembled themselves at Nearda and Nisibis, trusting themselves to the strength of these fortresses, which were inhabited also by men who were expert in arms. See here what the estate of those Jews was, who remained in Babylon.

How CAIUS was slain by CHAEREAS.

CAIUS did not onely expresse and manifest his fury towards those Jews that dwelt in Jerusalem, and in other neighbouring places; but also thorow all the countries both by land and sea, which were subject to the Romane Empire, filling the whole world with an infinite number of mischieses; yea, such and so hainous, as the like hereof hitherto have never been heard of. But Rome in especiall felt the force of his fury, which partook no lesse calamitie and misery, then any other Citie: but especially the Senatours, Patricians, and noble men were plagued. They also that were called Romane knights, who in wealth and dignitie were next unto the Senatours, for that out of their number such men were chosen, who were to supply the Senate, were vexed with intolerable injuries. For with ignominies they were detracted, with banishments and confiscations weakned, and by slaughters wholly exterminated. He likewise usurped the name of God, commanding his subjects to dignifie him with more then humane honours, and ascending the Capitol, which amongst all the Temples in Rome is most religiously honoured, he was so bold as to salute Jupiter, and to call him brother. Many such impieties committed he, by which he expressed, that his unbridled and boundlesse madnesse did never forsake him. Amongst his other mad pranks that he played, this is worthy of memory: for on a time, thinking it to be too much trouble for him to crosse the sea between Puteol a Citie in Campania, and Misenum another town seated by the sea-shore, in a galley; and otherwise esteeming it a thing correspondent to his greatnesse, who was Emperour, to craet that superioritie on the sea, which was answerable to his soveraigntie on the land, betwixt one Cape of the sea unto another, for the space of thirty furlongs or stades, betwixt which the gulse had his course, he caused a bridge to be built, on which he commanded himselfe to be drawn in a charriot, as if that way were answerable to the dignitie of his deity. He left not one Temple in Greece whatsoever, that he spoiled not of those excellent pictures or imagry that was therein; Giving a commission that all statues, and whatsoever ornaments or gifts, and presents that were dedicated in any Temple, should be brought unto him; saying, that such things as were admirable, should be reserved for a place of admiration, such as was the City of Rome: with these spoiles of the Temples decked he his Palace and Gardens, and generally all his houses and Palaces that he had in Italy. He was so impudent also, as to give direction, that Jupiter Olympius statue which the Greeks had in great estimation, and Phidias the Athenian carver had made, should be transported to Rome. But Memmius Regulus, to whom he directed this commission, executed it not, because the Masons informed him, that without spoiling it they could not remove it from the place. It is reported also, that he was hindered from this execution by such prodigies as are almost incredible: which he certified Caius of, giving him to understand, what the occasion was that had moved him to disobey him therein: and whilest he was in danger of death for this his delay, the sudden and successfull death of Caius warranted him from the same. Yea, so farre stretched his unbridled fury, that having a daughter newly born, he caused her to be carried into the Capitol, and laid at the feet of the Image of Jupiter; saying, that that child was common betwixt him & Jupiter, leaving the judgement to all men, which of the two parents was the greatest. And notwithstanding all these his misdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

He gave libertie to slaves also to accuse their masters of whatsoever crimes they would: which was so much the more hatefull, because all things were done by Caesars authoritie, and to his good liking: so that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durst accuse him, and Caius the Emperour was contented among the Judges to heare his uncle brought in question for his life, hoping (although it fell out otherwise) to pick out an occasion to put him to death. For having filled all the countries of his Empire with false accusations, and all sorts of mischieses, and giving slaves a prerogative above their masters; their Lords devised many conspiracies against him, some for spite, and with an intent to revenge them of those injuries they had received: other some pretending by his death to prevent those inconveniences that threatened them. In a word, his death concerned the securitie of the laws, and the safetie of all men: and had he not been speedily cut off, our nation had almost been utterly exterminated. For which cause I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of every occurrent, namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifestation of Gods power and will, which bring consolation unto those who are in adversitie;

sitie, and keep them within the bounds of modestie, who suppose that their prosperity should continue alwaies firme; and although they neglect vertue, think that no euill may befall them. Three plots of conspiracy were intended against him, and purposed to his utter ruine, each of them was attempted by men of great reckoning. For Emilius Regulus, who was borne in Corduba in Spain, was fully resolved to kill him, himselfe, or to make him away by the means of his confederates. Chareas Cassius, Colonell over a thousand men, was the chieftain of another band; and Annius Minucianus was in no lesse readinesse to doe his uttermost herein. The cause that moved them to accord thus altogether in hatred against Caius, was, that in respect of Regulus, he was by nature a detester of all iniquitie: for he was a man endowed with great magnanimity, and beautified with a liberall spirit; so as he dissembled not any of his counsels, but communicated them with many, who either were his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus, he was induced to seek his revenge, through the desire hee had to doe justice on him in Lepidus behalfe, who had been one of his especiall friends, and one of the rarest men that were ever found among the Roman citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the fear he had conceived of him) knowing well that all they, against whom Caius was incensed, could not escape with lesse indignitie then losse of life. As for the third man Chareas, he could not endure the shame and reproach of cowardise that Caius had objected against him; but feared besides, that his friendship and inward familiaritie with Caius would draw him into manifest dangers: for which cause and his own securitie and honours sake, he thought good to make him away. Generally, all of them were resolved to rid the world of Caius, and bring an end to his pride and tyrannicall power, for their hope was that their attempt should have good successe: which if it happily fell out, their countrey and common-weale should reape the fruits thereof, for whose securitie and safety, it became them to hazard themselves, though it were with losse of their heads. But above all the rest, Chareas was egged on with a desire he had to grow famous, and through the facilitie and convenient means he had to finish the same, because his Colonels roome gave him most secure access unto him. About that time the Circenian games were solemnized, which is a kinde of pastime which the Romanes very willingly behold, and to this intent they resort to the place of these exercises, and the common people is wont to demand somewhat at their Emperours hands, which they desire to obtain; and they, after they have examined their requests, doe never refuse them. Now they required with instant and importunate supplications, that Caius would discharge them of their taxations, and moderate the excessive tributes which they paid: but he would give no eare unto them, and caused those to be apprehended who called upon the matter most earnestly, sending his Guard, some of them one way, some of them another, to put them to the sword. After he had given this commandement, and they who received the charge, had fully executed it, a great number of men were slain. The people seeing this, ceased to exclaime any more, setting light by their goods; and seeing before their eyes, that their refusal would be the cause of their death. These considerations incited Chareas the more to execute his enterprize, to the end he might finish his furious and lawlesse life, whose pleasure was all mens injury and prejudice. And very oftentimes was he determined to set upon him whilst he banquetted, yet he deferred to doe the same, not for that he failed or fainted in his resolution, but because he expected some fit opportunitie to hit him home, and speed him to the death. He lived Captain of Caius Guard a long time, yet took he small pleasure in conversing with him.

But after that Caius had appointed him to gather in his tributes; and that money which was confiscate, he seemed to have lesse occasion then before: for at that time he had doubled their payments, in the execution whereof he followed his own nature rather then Cæsars command, and spared those of whom he ought to have compassion for their povertie sake. Caius was sore displeased herewith, and objected against him, that the cause why he delayed the bringing in of his money, was his cowardise and negligence: And among other outrages that he offered him, as oft as he gave him the watch-word, as he usually went to fetch it once a day upon his watch day, he gave him the names of women, and other that were full of ignominie, notwithstanding that he himselfe was not exempt from note of no lesse daintinesse. For in certain ceremonies which he himselfe had established, he attired himself like a woman, and was disguised with certain vailes, whereby he might the better counterfeite that sex, and yet notwithstanding durst he object this dishonour to Chareas. As oftentimes as Chareas received the watch-word, so oftentimes grew he in choler: which was increased the more at such time, as he delivered the same to his companions, who openly mocked and jeasted at him. For when it was his turn to receive the word from Cæsars mouth, he ordi-

narly fitted him with such a one as might move laughter, which made him the bolder to conspire with his confederates, in that he had just occasion to be displeased: among these was a Senator, and one that had past all honours and offices, otherwise an Epicure and lover of delights. Him did Timidius accuse (in that he was his enemy) that he had used certain injurious speeches against Caius: and for prooffe hereof, he alleadged Quintilia for his witness, a woman amongst all stage-players dearly beloved of many, but in especiall, by Popedius, by reason of her incomparable beauty: and for that she refused to bear witness in a matter falsely objected against him, whom she intirely loved, Timidius requited, that she might be examined by torture. Caius, provoked herewith, commanded Chareas with all expedition and diligence to see Quintilia tortured: and the rather gave he Chareas these commissions to kill and torment those whom he pleased, for that he had conceived this opinion, that he would acquit himselfe with more crueltie, to the end he might exempt himselfe of that reproach of faint-heartednesse which was wrongfully enforced against him.

Whilest thus Quintilia was led forth to be tortured, she trod upon the foot of one of those who were of the confederacie, giving him to understand that he should be of good courage, for that there was no fear that she would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with constancy: notwithstanding, Chareas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by constraint then of his own free will. And seeing he could enforce nothing out of her, he brought her back to Caius in so pitiful an estate, that all they that beheld her, had compassion on her. Caius likewise himselfe was moved, and bethinking him of those pains she had endured, he desisted from the enquest & accusation which was prosecuted against Popedius and Quintilia, and gave her a certain sum of money, to comfort her against the indisposition that might happen by reason of her torments, which she had so courageously endured.

This displeased Chareas very much, as if he had been the cause of all those evils that had hapned to those two persons, having been so great, that to heale them, it behoved Caius to minister a medicine. He consulted therefore with Clement, who was Captain of the footmen, and Papinius, who had the command of the guard, and spake unto them to this effect: We have (said he) O Clement, employed our selves to the uttermost for the Emperours safety: for by our providence and travell we have wrought so much, that of all those, who have conspired against him, some of them have been slain: the rest in such sort tormented and martyred, that Caius himselfe had compassion on them. But what reward or honour receive we for all these services? Clement, hearing these words, held his peace, giving manifest testimony by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly affacted he had so long time obeyed the Emperours commandements: and whilest he thought with himselfe that it was no policy for him to open his mouth against Caius crueltie, Chareas emboldned himselfe to discover the calamities and dangers wherein both the City and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him that the common report was, that Caius was the cause of them: but (said he) those that will narrowly examine the truth, will iudge that I, and Papinius that standeth by me, and you, Clement, more then we, have caused the Romanes torment, and the worlds misery, for that of our own will we have been ministers of Caius commands; and although the means lieth in us to make an end of those violences that are committed against the citizens, and injuries to the whole world: yet we serve him for his guard and hangmen, instead of men of warre. And we bear arms, not to maintain our liberty, and the Roman Empire, but to preserve him, who keeps their bodies and mindes in servitude: and every day are we soyled in their blood who are slain and tortured, until such time as some one serve us with the same sauce, to satisfy Caius crueltie. For it is not for the good will he beareth us, that he maketh use of us; but that which is more, we are suspected by him, and he will cause us to be slain, as he hath done others. For his displeasure is not limited by justice, but by his will: we also shall serve him for a mark to aime at. For which cause, it behoveth us to provide for the securitie and libertie of all men, and especially to warrant our selves against those dangers that threaten us.

Clement declared by apparent signes, that he thought well of Chareas resolution, but he counselled him to make no words of it, for fear the rumour thereof should be spread among the people, and the secret should be discovered before the execution: and lest that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they should all of them be drawn into danger of death: and in the mean while, it behoved them to hope that some good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himselfe, his age had taken from him the necessary courage that belonged to such enterprises. It may be (said he) that I may furnish you with some advice more secure then yours is, Chareas: for a more honeste then it is, who is he that can propose? This said, Clement returned to his house, ruminating with himselfe upon those words which he

he had both heard and spoken. But Chareas waxt fearfull, and conferred with the Colonell, Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a lover of liberty, and greatly discontented with the estate about the miseries of the common-weale; and seeing it was necessary to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, he thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing lest Clement should discover all the conspiracie, considering that delay and procrastination would be but an occasion to hinder the action. When as therefore he perceived him to give willing eare to all that which he intended, and that already he was confirmed with no lesse resolution then himself was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly communicate the same, he said nothing: whereas otherwise he was ready, not onely to conceale that which he had heard, but also declared that which he had in his heart, he was so much the more encouraged. For which cause, without further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable unto them in vertue, good affection, and great courage; and who besides that, was suspected by Caius by reason of Lepidus death. For Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, and had been associates in the same dangers. For Caius was feared by all those who had any publike office, sparing none of them in particular or in generall, but made them all groane under the burthen of this fury.

Now they knew well one another, that all of them were displeased to see the common-weale in that estate: but the apprehension of the danger suffered them not to manifest the hatred that each one of them bare to Caius, although their secret conceit ingendred among them a certain amity. For before that time, as often as they met together, they were accustomed to esteeme Minucianus for the most honourable man of the company; as in truth, among all the citizens of Rome he was the most famous, valiant and best esteemed among them: being therefore assembled at that time, he was first of all requested to speak his opinion. For which cause he asked Chareas what the watch-word was he had received that day (for all the city knew very wel what mockery Caius usually used in giving Chareas the watch-word:) Chareas, notwithstanding this disgrace, failed not to answer him, relying on the wisdom of Minucianus, and said unto him, But give you me for the watch-word, Liberty; mean while I give you thanks for that you have awakened me more speedily then of my self I have accustomed to be. You need not now any further inforce your selfe to incite me by your words, sith both you and I have undertaken the same resolution. Before we were assembled in this place, our thoughts were united. Behold here my sword, that is girt unto my side; this shall suffice for us both. And if you please, you shall be my captain, and I will march under your command, and will follow you under assurance of your assistance and wisdom. They, who have valiant hearts, never want arms: for it is a confident courage that makes the weapon walk. That which enkindleth me thus to this action, is not the consideration of my particular interest: for I have not the leisure to think on those dangers that threaten me, through the grief that I conceive, to see the libertie of my countrey changed into servitude, and the force of the laws wholly abolished, and all sorts of men assigned to death by the cruelty of Caius. It is I that deserve to be trusted in this execution, and I make you my Judge, sith you have the like intention as I have.

Minucianus, perceiving with what affection Chareas spake, embraced him with all love; and after he had praised him, he exhorted him to continue his constancy: then departed they one from the other, with prayers and wishes; and at that time there hapned a presage that confirmed them the more. For as Chareas entred into the Senate, some one among the people cast out a word, that redoubled his courage. Disparch (said he) that which thou hast to doe: for God will assist thee. Chareas was some-what affraid, lest some one of his associates had betrayed him. But at last, he thought it was some one of those, who, being privie to his resolution, gave him a watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, governing and observing of humane affairs, pushed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to divers, sundry Senatours, knights, and men of warre being advertised hereof, were in arms. For there was not any one that supposed not that Caius death was the greatest good hap the common-wealth could expect. For which cause, all of them enforced themselves as much as they could, to assist the execution with courageous and vertuous resolution; and as forward were they in affection as in power, in words as in effect, desiring each of them to be partakers in the dispatch of a Tyrant. For Calisthus also, who was Caius free-man, and raised him to great authoritie, yea, such as he almost equaled him, adjoynded himself to them for the fear he apprehended of all men, and for those great riches which he had gathered together, for that he was a man of a corrupt conscience, and easily won by bribes and presents, doing wrong to all men, & abusing the power he had, against whosoever he pleased,

A contrary to all right and reason. Besides, for that he knew the unbridled nature of Caius, who having once conceived an ill opinion of any man, could never afterwards be dissuaded or reconciled. Amongst divers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatnesse of the danger of his riches was not the least, which was the cause that made him serve Claudius, and secretly to follow him under hope, that after Caius death, he should be his successor in the Empire, and that at that time he should by him be maintained in the same estate, which he enjoyed: and by this means thought he to obtain his amitie and good liking, by giving him to understand how Caius had commanded him to poison him, and how he had invented infinite delays to defer this execution. As for mine own part, I think that Calisthus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been dissuaded by Calisthus allegations, who had incontinently received his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Masters command, with all expedition in a matter so acceptable to him. So it is; that the providence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage against Claudius; and Calisthus was thereby thanked for a benefit which he no waies deserved.

Those that were about Chareas day by day, followed the action very slowly, notwithstanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought all occasions fit to finish his purpose in, for that he might assaile him at such time as he ascended up into the Capitol, or even then when he solemnized those ceremonies, which he had instituted in honour of his daughter, or at such time as he stood in the palace to scatter gold, and silver money among the people, by casting him from the top of the Palace into the market place, or at such time as he celebrated those mysteries, that were introduced by him. For no man suspected Chareas, so discreetly had he behaved himselfe in all things: and he perswaded himself that no man would have thought that he should lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet so it is, that the power of the gods was sufficient to give him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chareas was sore displeased against his companions, in respect that he feared that they would let slip their occasions; and although they perfectly knew that he travelled for the maintenance of the lawes, and for the good of them all: yet did they request him to delay a little, for fear lest in the execution he should in some sort miscarry, and for that cause the Citie might be brought in trouble, by the informations that would be made of that act; and that finally when Caius should be so much the better defended against them, they should not know how to shew their vertue, when the time required that they should assault and set upon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunitie to set forward this businesse, should be the time in which the games of the Palace were celebrated, which were solemnized in honour of Caesar, who first of all disannulled the peoples authoritie, and appropriated it to himselfe. This solemnitie is celebrated in a Tent before the Palace, where the noble citizens with their wives and children remained to behold the sport, and Caesar himselfe likewise. At that time concluded they that it would be an easie matter for the, when as so many thousands of people should be shut up in so narrow a place; so that he, who would step foremost to give the stroke, might very easily be succoured, for that he could have no force in armes, although his guard should have the courage and desire to defend him. Chareas resolved upon this, and it was concluded that the first day of those sports that were next at hand, the deed should be done: but their adventure was greater then their conclusion. For the delay was such, as the third day was almost past, and hardly could they be drawn to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chareas assembled all the confederates, and told them that the opportunitie of time had overslipped them; accused and reproached them of slacknesse in that execution, which had been so virtuously resolved amongst them: and that it was to be feared, lest if any should be discovered, the whole matter should wax frustrate: by which means Caius might grow more cruell then he was before. See we not (said he) that by how much liberty we take from our selves, by so much we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought first of all to obtain securitie for our selves, and afterwards purchase perpetuall felicitie to others, the greatest glory whereof shall redound unto our selves. Now they having nothing to reply against so honourable a resolution, and yet notwithstanding no waies enforcing themselves towards the action, but remaining altogether dismayed without one word speaking, Chareas spake thus:

demean our selves justly, and challenge nothing but dishonour, if some Egyptian supposing G that men of free condition could not any longer endure his insolence, should put the matter in execution? For mine own part, I will dreame no longer upon your consultations, but this very day will I hazard my selfe; and betide me what can, I will sustain all fortunes with pleasure and courage. For I am a man of that minde, that no danger can be so great or grievous to daunt me, as that Caius should be slain, during my life-time, and I should be deprived of so deserved an honour, which so worthy attempt may challenge. This said, he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the rest to doe the like; so that all of them were desirous to set hand to the enterprize, without any further delay. The custome was, that the captains of the guard entred the Palace with their swords by their sides, and in such equipage they asked the Emperour the watch-word. At that time it fortuned that it was Chereas turn to fetch the watch-word, when as a great number of people flocked to the Palace, to take up their places to behold the games with great prease and noise; wherein Caius was greatly delighted: for there was no distinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one sate together confusedly, men and women, slaves and freemen. Caius, arriving there first, had offered sacrifice in honour of Cesar Augustus, in dignifying whom likewise those sports were solemnized. It came to passe that whilest those beasts were emboweld, that were appointed for sacrifice, Asprenas gown, who at that time was Senator, was besprinkled with blood: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithstanding, this was a presage for Asprenas. For he was slain that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaved himselfe most affably toward all men, so that all the assistance were astonished to behold the courtesie that he used. After the sacrifice was done, he sate him down to behold the pastimes, and had about him the most noble of his friends and familiars. Now was there every yeer a Theater builded, according to this forme and fashion that ensueth: It had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening upon the porch, by which the actors had their egress and regress, without disturbance of those who sate to behold the pastime. There was within the same a certain severall roome, separated from the rest, where the Players and Musicians kept. When the people were seated, and Chereas with the Captains were neer about Cesar, who sate on the right side of the Theater: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Arms, asked Cluvitus privily in his eare, who sate by him and had in like sort been Consul, whether he heard any news? who answering him, that he had heard nothing. On this day (said Batibius) shall the tragedy be plaid of a Tyrants death. Cluvitus made him this reply in Homers words:

Whist: lest some Greek should listen to our talke.

Now whilest some one darted certain apples and rare and precious birds at the people, Caius took great pleasure to behold how they strove one with another round about him, busfetting one another to see who should get the same: but at that present there chanced two presages: for the sport that was represented, was of a Judge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the dance they represented Cynera, who was slain with Myrrha her daughter: and there was a great quantite of blood gathered to counterfeite both the murther of the Judge that was crucified, as also of Cynera. It is affirmed likewise that the day was the very same, whereon Philip the sonne of Amynas King of Macedon, had been slain by Pausanias one of his familiars, at such time as he entred the Theater. Whilest Caius was incertain with himself whether he should remain untill the sports were finished, for that it was the last day of them, or rather should resort to the bath, and after he had taken his refection, return back again thither, as he had done beforetime; Mimucianus sitting next unto him, fearing lest the occasion should be overslipt, arose for that he had seen Chereas depart out of doors, with an intent to goe and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the gown, saying, Whither goe you my friend? At which time for the reverence sake that he bare unto Cesar, he sate him down again: but the fear that he had, grew so forcible, that he arose again; so that Caius could not detain him, supposing that he had departed thence to dispatch some important businesse. At that time did Asprenas counsell Cesar to repaire to the bath, telling him that after his refection he might return thither again; all which he did, being desirous that the resolution might take effect. They that were with Chereas were already disposed to take advantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to stand prepared and in a readinesse, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the tragedy: and the delay was very grievous unto them, for that it was already three a clock after noon. So that Chereas seeing that Caius lingered so long, intended to goe in unto him and assaile him in his seat: but he conceived that

A that he could not bring that to passe without great losse and murther of the Senators, and Knights that were there present. Now although he had this apprehension, yet addressed he himselfe to the execution thereof, supposing that the losse that might happen by the death of some one, would be well recompenced by the securitie and libertie, that would redound unto all men. When as therefore they were in a readinesse to enter the Theater, news was brought them that Caius was risen to come forth; by means whereof there arose some noise. For which cause the confederates turned back into the Theater, and appeased the people, telling them that they displeased and annoyed the Emperour: but the effect was, to draw him aside from all those, who might yeeld him any assistance; and so to set upon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his uncle, and M. Minucianus his sisters husband and Valerius, who at that time was Proconsul, who might not any waies be drawn from their place, although they had the will, by reason of the place and dignitie which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Aruntius. Now when he was entered into the palace, he left the ready way where his officers were, & Claudius with his associates held: he turned aside by an unfrequented way to the baths, upon purpose to see certain young boyes, who were come out of Asia, and were sent him out of that countrey, partly to sing in those ceremonies that were instituted by him, and partly to dance in arms about the Theater; and in that place Chareas came and encountred him, asking him the watch-word: which Gaius gave him very reproachfully according to his custome. For which cause without any further delay, Chareas assailing him both in word and act, drew his sword and gave him a great wound, which notwithstanding was not mortall: some say that Chareas purposely wounded him after that sort, because he would not kill him at once, but to his further torment increase the number of his wounds: but I cannot beleieve the same, for that in such executions a man hath no leasure to determine how to strike. And if Chareas had such an intention, I account him the veriest foole that might be, for that he rather took his pleasure to content his despite, then readily to deliver both himselfe and others, who by his delay in being of his confederacy might be drawn into hazard. For if Caius had not been suddenly slain, he could not have wanted means of rescous, and it should seeme that Chareas had not pretended to doe so much mischief to Caius, as to himselfe and his fellow confederates. And being in this uncertaintie, whether his enterprize should have fallen out happily or no, he had without reason both undone himselfe and lost the occasion: whereas having happily hit home, he might without a word speaking, warrantize himselfe against those, who would offend him. But let each man think what best pleaseth him. Caius feeling the griefe of the wound (for he was stricken betwixt the shoulder and the neck, and his sword could not pierce further, by reason that it hit upon the first bone of the brest) he cried not in any sort, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he distrusted them all, or that he had some other thought, and in lamenting himselfe he past onward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus, who was already prepared to encounter him, who thrust him down upon his knees: whereupon all of them environed him round about, and with mutuall exhortations encouraged one another to doe their uttermost in murthering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gave him the deadly wound, that severed his soule from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chareas. For although divers set to their hands in the action; yet was he the first, who had bethought him of the action, having long time before any of them premeditated the same, after what sort it should be attempted: and he also was the first that durst boldly impart it unto others, and who after they had allowed of his resolution assembled them: and when as every one was to speak his opinion, he concluded the same very discretely, and had alwaies done farre more then the rest; so that by his earnest and honourable perswasions, he encouraged those that were faint-hearted, since at such time as the opportunitie presented it selfe, to set hand to the execution, he was the first that attempted it, and who valiantly strook and made an easie way to the rest, who found Caius calme enough, in that he was a man almost thorowly slain. For which cause, it is necessary, that all that which others have done, should be ascribed to Chareas advice, vertue and diligence.

Thus died Caius, being slaughtered with many mortall wounds; now when Chareas and his companions had dispatched him, they perceived well that it would be impossible for them to save themselves, if so be they should return by the way that they came; so much were they ravished with that which they had done. For they drew themselves into no small danger, by murthering an Emperour, who was cherished and beloved through the folly of the common people, and whose death the men of warre would not leave unpunished. Now in that the waies were narrow where the murther was done, and they themselves also were hindered by reason of the great number of people, and officers and souldiers that gave their attendance that day in guarding the Emperour, they took another way and retired themselves into Germanicus lodging, who was Caius father, whom they had lately slaughtered. This house adjoynd upon the palace. For although the palace was but one, yet consisted it of divers lodgings which were builded by severall Emperours; whose names, whether they had begun or finished the works, were imposed on the same buildings. When as therefore they were escaped from the prease, they were in safety as long as the inconvenience that had befallen the Emperour was as yet hidden. The first report of his death came to the Germanes who were of his guard, being a company chosen out of that nation named the Celtique band, for the preservation of the Emperours person. These men are very prone unto wrath, and amongst all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the causes of their execution: otherwise they are men strong in body, and who in the wars alwaies give the first onset, yeelding great advantage to those on whose side they fight. They having notice of Caius murder, were vehemently aggrieved thereat, for that it is their maner to censure all things, not according to right, but as they are answerable to their own profits: Caius in especiall was dearely beloved by them, in that he had obtained their favour by bestowing much money upon them. Their Captain was one called Sabinus, who was not advanced to that estate, either for his vertue or the nobilitie of his ancestors (for he was but a fencer) but for his mightie strength and huge body. They therefore ranne about with their naked swords searching for Caesars murderers from house to house: and meeting with Asprenas at first, whose gowne (as we have said) was bebloudied with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifice, which was a presage that boaded him but little good fortune, they hewed him in pieces. The second was Norbanus (who for his nobilitie and ancestors might derive his titles from the noblest citizens, amongst whom were divers Generals of Armies) who seeing they made no reckoning of his dignitie, and being of himselfe endowed with great force and strength, he took a sword from one of them which first assailed him, with whom he grappled, and made them know that he intended they should buy his blood very dearely: and indeed so had he done, but that being invironed by divers, who assailed him at once, he was beaten down and slaughtered with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with some others met not with these men by chance, as the two other had done, but to shew the hatred that he bare unto Caius, and the pleasure that he took to see him lie dead, was come out of his house, being egged on with envy to feed his eyes with that spectacle. For Caius had banished Anteius father, whose name likewise was Anteius, and not content therewith, he had sent his souldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleasure beheld the slaughtered carcase of this tyrant: but hearing the uproare that was raised in every part of the house, he thought good to hide himselfe; yet might he not avoid the narrow search of the Germanes, who were so displeased, that they slew all those whom they met with, whether they were guilty or guiltlesse of the fact. Thus were these three made away.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theater, every one was amazed, and could scarcely beleve it. For although divers of them were very glad, that he was taken out of the world, perswading themselves that it would highly profit them; yet did their fear hinder their beliefe. On the other side, there were some, who desiring not that any such mishap should befall Caesar, and conceiving in their thoughts, that it was impossible to be done, for that there was no man so hardy, as to enterprize the same; they supposed the report to be utterly untrue. Of this minde were certain women and children, slaves and souldiers.
These, by reason they received wages at his hand, and tyrannized with him, being his ministers in all those outrages that he offered to many good citizens, in partaking the booty and other advantages that Caius drew unto him. As for the women and children, they were of that opinion, by reason that such kinde of people take delight in plaies, jests, donations of flesh, and other such pastimes, which Caius in word pretended to doe to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to have means to satisfie his rage and crueltie. He was also gracious among the servants and slaves, for that by him they had the liberty to accuse and contemn their Masters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falsely accused their Masters, they were easily beleaved: and when they discovered their Masters treasures, in recompence of their discoverie they were not onely made free by him, but also sent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that was assigned them, was the eighth part of those goods that were confiscated. As for certain of the nobility, although the matter seemed true to some of them, for that before-time they were privie to that which the rest intended, and notwithstanding they desired that the enterprize should be effected:
yet

yet kept they all things close, and gave no sign of joy, nor made any shew that they heard that which was reported. For some of them feared lest if they should be frustrated of their hope, they should bring themselves in danger of punishment, for that they had discovered their intent sooner then they should have done. They likewise who knew the enterprize and were confederates with the actors, yet did they more closely conceale it the one from the other, fearing lest if they should discover the matter to any one of those, who drew any commoditie from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them: whereby if Caius should be yet alive, they might incur the danger of punishment. For the voice was, that he had been wounded in certain places; yet that he was not slain; but as yet alive, and among his Physicians hands, who dressed his wounds. No man therefore durst liberally discover the secrets of his heart to his neighbour: for they that spread those reports, were either friends (and for that cause were suspected as favourers of his tyranny) or enemies, and by that means in that they were but finifterly affected towards Caius, there was no certaintie to be gathered of that which they said. There arose also another report, which abashed & beat down the hearts and hopes of the nobility, namely, that Caius setting light by the danger wherein he was, & as little also by the wounds he had received, was come into the market place all bloody as he was, & after that maner declaimed before the people. See here how they that spread these rumors, preferred their conjectures, which were void of all reason; which distracted those uncertainly that heard the same, according as they were affectioned. This notwithstanding no man removed from his place, for fear lest they should be suddenly accused, knowing well that they should be censured, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the disposition of their Judges and accusers.

But after that the troupe of Germanes had invironed the Theater with their naked swords, all the assistance expected nothing but death; and as soon as any man entred, they were seized with such an amazement, as if they had already felt the strokes; so that they knew not what to doe, having no heart to depart from thence: and otherwise perswading themselves, that if they staid there any longer, it would breed them further danger. Finally, when the souldiers were entred into the Theater by force, all the whole assembly cried out, and besought them, protesting that whatsoever was done, it was besides their knowledge, whether it were either attempted by conspiracy, or any other means. They therefore most humbly intreated them, that they would spare them, and not inflict the penaltie of the guilty on those that were innocent for their own parts, they besought them to search out those, who had committed the act, if any such thing were committed. And thus spake they with tears, beating their breasts, and calling the gods to witnesse, alladging all that which the present danger suggested them with, and as much as such as pleaded for their lives could proffer. By these perswasions of theirs the souldiers fury was abated, so that they began to repent themselves of that which they had executed in the Theater: for this also was a cruelty, as they themselves (notwithstanding their barbarous incivility) supposed it to be, which was, that the heads of Aspremus and other that were slain, were carried and set upon an Altar. Whereat all the assistants were most grievously discontented, remembring themselves of the dignity of the men, and having compassion of that which had befallen them, considering also that they themselves were not farre off from dangers, being uncertaint whether they should save themselves: whereby it came to passe, that some of those, who had for good cause hated Caius, durst not freely rejoyce at his death, because they were upon the point to lose their own lives, having as yet no appearance of any safety.

At length Auruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common criers, who had a strong voice, and by crying such goods as were to be sold, had gathered so great substance, as that he was accounted one of the richest men in Rome, and in great estimation amongst all men in that behalfe, entred the Theater in a mourning habit, and after a lamentable maner: and although he inwardly hated Caius, yet for the fear he conceived lest he should lose his goods, and in consideration of the present danger, he dissembled his joy, wearing all those garments of mourning, and using no lesse lamentation then if he had bemoaned the death of his dearest friend. After this manner came he into the Theater, publishing Caius death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned: after this, he began to repress the rage of the Germanes, and commanded their Captains and Tribunes to put up their swords, certifying them of the Emperours death, which act of his did manifestly save the lives of all those, who were assembled in the Theater; and all them likewise, whom they could have met with. For if they had had but the least surmise, that Caius had as yet been alive, there was not any sort of cruelty which they had not committed. For they bare him so great love and affection, that to warrantize him from that mis-hap, they would have redeemed him with the losse of their own lives. But as soon as they understood he was dead, they repressed their furious rage, which edged them forward to revenge: knowing that it availed them nothing to discover their affections towards him, in that he could yeeld them no requitall. Besides, the fear they had lest that in pursuit of their tyrannous murders, the Senate should be incensed against them, if so be the government of the estate should be returned into their hands, made them containe themselves. Thus was the fury of these Germans appeased for the death of Caesar.

Mean-while Chareas (who feared very much lest Minnucianus should fall into the Germans hands, and in their fury be slaughtered by them) fought for him among the souldiers, enquiring of every one whether they knew if he were slain or no. Whereupon Minnucianus and Clement were brought unto him, who in his presence commended Chareas exploit, and gave him thanks in the name of the whol Senate, who witnessed that it was to the general benefit and good of the common-weale, and that the greatest persons were beholding to him, for that he had neither wanted good advice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his resolution; alleading that the nature of tyranny was such, that being puffed up with a short pleasure of unjust and intolerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in misery, as it manifestly appeared in that which had befallen Caesar; who before any thing was either devised, practized or executed against him, was already hatefull to all men, and had in such sort violated all laws; that his greatest friends were resolved to take arms against him, who in appearance had deprived him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himselfe, who was the author of his own ruine.

Hereupon all they arose who were in the Theater, and raised great noise and trouble in seeking to save themselves. The occasion was, that a certain Physician called Arcion, being called out to goe and dresse certain men that were wounded, making a shew as if he went to go and prepare such things, as were necessary for those that were wounded, made those issue out with him who fate neereft unto him: but the truth was, that he did it to the end to draw them out of the present danger. Mean-while the Senate assembled themselves in the Palace, and the people flocked together to make enquire after those, who had murdered Caesar: the people with an intire and simple intent, the Senate obely to use some formall proceeding. For Valerius Asiaticus, who had otherwhiles been Consul, came forth among the people, who were in an uproare; and supposing it a strange matter that no man knew who had slain the Emperour, whilst every one enquired who it was that had done the deed: O said he, would it had been I that had done it. But the Consuls published an edict, containing the accusations that were presented against Caesar, commanding the people and souldiers, who were as yet in the Theater, to retire themselves to their lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they should be eased of those taxations, wherewith beforetime they had been burthened: and the men of warre were promised honours and dignities, if they would contain themselves in their accustomed order, and stirre up no further trouble. For it was to be feared, lest if they had been further fleshed in slaughters, the City should have fallen into some great danger through rapines and spoiles both of houses and temples. But by this time all the whole order of the Senate were assembled, especially those who were confederates in Caesar murder, who seemed to gather courage, and to speak boldly, as if the government of the estate had been fallen into their hands.

CHAP. II. How Claudius took upon him the government of the Empire.

WHILEST the estate of the Empire was thus distracted, Claudius was suddenly fetched out of his house: for the souldiers assembling themselves together, and conferring among themselves what was requisite to be done, perceived that it was impossible, that so many and so waighty affairs of the common-weale should be well disposed by a popular government, and that this change also would yeeld them little profit, if some of those who were in authoritie should happen to obtain the sovereign government. Furthermore, that it would be every way prejudiciall unto them, if they had not a part of the governance, and a hand in the administration of the common-weale. Whilst therefore the sovereign authoritie remained as yet undisposed, they thought meet to elect Claudius, who was Caesar uncle, for their Emperour; who was a man of that reputation, that none of those, who had been assembled in the Senate, was more capable then he was, both in regard of the vertue of his ancestors, as also in respect of the doctrine wherewith he was endowed.

A dowed. Who likewise being by them exalted to the dignitie of the Empire, would honour them, and with all answerable bountie acknowledge their good deserts. This conclusion of theirs was both admitted, and presently executed: so that Claudius was received and elected Emperour by the men of warre. But Cnaius Sentius Saturninus having intelligence that Claudius was in this sort elected (who in appearance seemed veruously to contradict, but in effect desired nothing more) presented himself before the Senate: and being neither amated nor amazed in any sort, he freely spake his minde; and as it became his birth and nobilitie, he spake unto the assembly after the maner that ensueth:

You Lords of Rome, although it be an incredible matter, that the liberty which hath so long time been unexpected, should return and visit us; yet so it is, that we see the excellency thereof; although it be uncertain how long time the Gods will bestow it on us: which is such, that it may rejoyce us for the present; what issue soever it may have hereafter. For to them that know what vertue is, it is no small felicitie to live one hour in freedome of minde, and in a free countrey governed by such laws, which in times past have made our common-weal to flourish. For mine own part, I cannot remember our ancient liberty, for that I was born after the subversion thereof: But I infinitely desire to have the happy fruition of that which we enjoy at this present. And I think them also very happie, who are born and brought up in vertuous studies. I likewise suppose that a second honour next to the immortall Gods is to be ascribed to them, by whose vertue at last though very late even in this our age, we have obtained the felicitie to enjoy the same; which happinesse would God with but inheritances we might bequeath to our posteritie. For in regard of ourselves, this day sufficeth us both, as well all those that are young as they also who are old. For the aged shall forsake this life with more pleasure, in that they have had the knowledge of that blessing which is annexed to their libertie: and the younger shall be furnished with a royall example in admiring and knowing their vertues, by whom we enjoy this benefit of freedome. For in regard of the present time, there is not any thing that we ought more earnestly to affect; then to live veruously. For onely vertue is the thing that confirmeth men in their liberty. I cannot speak of the time past, but onely by hearfay: but for that I have seen with mine eyes, and perceived by my observation, I know how great mischiefs tyrannies do ordinarily breed in a politike estate: for they utterly extinguish all vertue, and deprive freemen of all that perfect magnanimity that may be in them, and teach both to flatter and to fear, for that the common-weal is abandoned not to the wisdom of the laws, but to the fury of intemperate governours. For since Julius Caesar bent his thoughts to overthrow the popular government in Rome, and violated that happy course of law, whereby our state was policied, the common-weal hath been overthrowen. For in subjecting the law to his good liking, and himself to his particular desires, there is not any kinde of miserie and mischief, that hath not overthrowen our citie; so that his successors have imployed themselves to the uttermost, and with a certain emulation, to abolish the laws of our countrey, striving which of them might despoil our common-weal of her noblest citizens: for that they have made their account, that their securitie consisted in communicating their secrets with such as were base and abject; abasing not onely the haughty courages of those men, who were famous for their nobilitie and vertue, but also by slaughtering a great number of them by all sorts of punishment: and whilst each of them laboured to be absolute in their command, they enforced themselves to oppresse the common-weal.

But amongst all the rest, Caius, who this day hath lost the benefit of life, hath wrought greater mischiefs himself alone, then any other, by enforcing his brutish and beastly wrath not onely against the common citizens, but also against his own parents and friends; demeaning himself alike towards all men, and manifesting his injustice in that he pursued them with most injury, who were most innocent: and by this means grew hatefull not onely to men, but also to the immortall Gods. For it is not enough for tyrants to satisfie their concupiscence, to use all sorts of outrages, to ravish both mens wealth and their wives; but also their gain and glorie is, when they may utterly ruinate both their fortunes and families, who are their enemies. For all liberty is opposed against tyranny, and it is impossible (notwithstanding all the miseries that it may be imagined or offered) that freemen should accord with tyrants; how little time soever it be that they have exercised their tyranny. They also know too well with how many mischiefs they have intrangled their subjects (although they have not the spirits to revenge themselves of those wrongs that are done unto them) and being well assured into what incombrances they have drawn them, perswade themselves, that they have but one onely means left them to warrantize themselves from suspicions, and to procure their own securitie, which is, to put them to death, if they may possibly do it.

Sith therefore at this present you are delivered from so many mischiefs, and are no more subject, except to one another (which is a pledge of concord for the present, and of security in time to come, and glory unto him that hath redressed the estate) you shall deal very well and wisely in my opinion to provide for the common-weal, foreseeing very diligently all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to speak his opinion of that which displeaseth him, for that there is no superiour to countermand their sayings, or that is exempt from reproof if he offend against the common-weal, or that may threaten with the authority of an Emperour for that shall be said. For what else in these later times hath increased and furthered our over-topping tyrannie, then their slothfull fear, who durst in no sort oppose themselves against his lust? For being entangled by a certain kinde of pleasure of a quiet life, and accustomed to live after the maner of slaves, and being afraid also to die vertuously, and desirous to live with shame, we are fallen into these scarce sufferable calamities, and into such mischiefs as have concerned us too neerly. First of all therefore, you ought to honour those, who have slain the tyrant, by dignifying them with as great honours as may be imagined, and especially Chareas. For he onely hath been the man, who by the power of the gods, and through his great wisdom and valour, hath given you your libertie. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heap honours on his head, yea especiall favours, as to the man who first of all consulted, and first of all hazarded himself against a tyrant for your liberty. It is an honest and well-beseeming action in men of free hearts, to restore and repay condigne kindnesse for the benefits that they have received: such is this man in your behalf, not like to Brunus and Cassius, who murdered Caesar, for they were the originals of seditions and civill warres in this city: and this man by the death of a tyrant, hath not onely at once delivered you of him, but also hath cut off all those mischiefs that arose by him.

Thus spake Sentius, and his advice was entertained with great applause, not onely by the Senators, but the knights also that were there present. Whereupon a certain Senator called Trebellius Maximus arose, and stepping to him, pulled off the ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was incased a stone with Caius picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off: so intent was he about that which he both said and did: and by this means the engraved image was broken. Now for that it was late, Chareas demanded the watch-word at the Consuls hands, who gave him the word Liberty. Thus all of them were astonished at this change, and could scarcely beleieve that which had happened. For since that time that the popular government had been abolished, the Consuls had never given the watch-word untill that present time. For before the city was oppressed by tyranny, the Consuls commanded the men of warre. After that Chareas had received the word, he gave it to his souldiers, who subscribed to the Senates authority: of these there were about four companies, which preferred the lawfull government before a tyranny, who also retired themselves to their chieftains. As for their parts, the people returned to their severall houses, full of joy, hope, and courage, for that they had regained the government of the state, which belonged unto them, and not to any particular governour. In a word, Chareas was their onely hope: He foreseeing that there would some mischief follow, if Caius wife and daughter should remain alive; and that if all his friends and family should not be utterly extinguished, all those who should be spared, would serve to no other end, but to the ruin of the common-weal and the laws: and on the other side, desiring to see a finall end of that which he had begun, and to satisfie that hatred he had conceived against Caius, he sent Julius Lupus one of the captains of the guard, to kill both his wife and daughter, which he did. And the cause why he gave this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clementis kinsman, who was a confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end that partaking after this maner the death of the tyrant, he might be known to have dealt as forwardly for the common-weal, as if from the beginning he had been a counsellor and agent in the conspiracie. Notwithstanding there were some of his companions of that opinion, that it should be but crueltie to deal with a woman in that sort, for that Caius had offended through the corruption of his own nature, and not by the counsell of his wife; and that all those evils which he committed in the common-weal, by desolating the flower thereof, was his own offence, not hers.

There were others that accused her to be the cause of all that which Caius had committed, alleading that she had given him an amorous drink, by which he was tied and entangled in such sort unto her, and so led and transported by her love, that she governed all that which concerned the estate of Rome, and the world subject to Rome; but her defenders prevailed nothing. For finally it was resolved that she should lose her life.

To finish this tragedy, Lupus was dispatcht, who lost no time in the accomplishment of their

A their intent who had sent him, for fear he had to be blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the common-weal. As soon as therefore he came into the palace, he found Casoria, Caius widdow, lying fast by the body of her slaughtered husband, destitute of all that which the law gratifieth those that are dead with, altogether bloody and greatly afflicted, having her daughter fast couched by her: Being in this estate, she was heard to utter no other words, but that she blamed Caius, for that he had not given credit to that counsell which she had given him so often: which words of hers, were by certain of them interpreted two wayes. For some of them thought that she meant, that she had counselled her husband to give over his cruelty, and murders which he exercised against his citizens; and that in his government he should use a tempered measure with vertue, for fear lest his subjects misliking of his manners, should seek his destruction. Others took it as if she had encouraged Caius to set upon the conspirators and kill them, without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that means provide for his securitie. They therefore said, that Casoria blamed Caius for that he had behaved himself too carelessly, in that wherein she had counselled him. Such were the words Casoria spake, and such was the exposition, as divers men interpreted the same.

The year of the world, 4005. after the nativity of Christ, 43.

Casoria accused Caius for that he would not give credit to her counsell;

She seeing Lupus coming, shewed him Caius body, and besought him with tears and complaints to come no neerer. But perceiving that he continued in his resolution, and made no account of her words, but did that for which he came, after that she knew the cause of his arrivall, she offered her naked throat unto him, with a great courage, using such supplications as they ordinarily do who despair of their lives. For she willed him to deferre no longer, to finish that tragedy which his companions had begun, and died in this sort courageously by the hand of Lupus: and after her was her daughter slain, which was very young. This did Lupus certifie Chereas of with all expedition. This was Caius end, after he had lived four years, wanting four moneths. Before such time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate and wicked man, and addicted to his pleasure, a favourer of tale-bearers, exceeding fearfull, and for that cause, when he got the upper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He esteemed this the onely fruit of his power, when he abused the same against innocents, and gathered or heaped up great spoils and booties by wicked and unjust murders, rapines and oppressions; lifting himself above all humane authority, and affecting to be esteemed as a God, suffering himself to be transported by the peoples praises. Furthermore, all that which the law condemned and punished, as a thing most detestable, that made he use of to punish vertue with. He never remembered any friendship that had been done him, how great soever it either was or had been, at such time as he was in his choler, and was apt to inflict punishments in his rage on just and upright men. All that which was answerable to vertue, was odious in his eyes: In all things that him listed he had so violent appetites, that it was impossible to contradict him; so that he was not ashamed to use the unlawfull companie of his own sister: whereby it came to passe, that the citizens of Rome began to hate him extremely, for that the like matter had not been seen nor heard of: of a long time men could not beleeve the same, yet notwithstanding they sufficiently expressed the hatred they bare against the fact he had committed. It cannot be said of him, that he builded any work be-seeming his royall magnificence worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the present or future world, except some ports that he made neer to Rhegium and Sicilia, for harbour of such ships as came and went into Egypt for corn, which doubtles is a goodly and mighty work, and very profitable for such as travell by sea. True it is, that it was not brought to perfection, but onely half finished, because the workmen travelled leasurely. But the chief cause thereof was, that he spent his study in unprofitable matters, and loved rather to consume his substance to feed his own private lusts wherein he took great delight, then to erect and build any goodly or famous work, which might have redounded to the profit of the common-weal. Otherwise he was a man well spoken, and very expert in the Greek and vulgar Romane tongues, apprehending presently, that which others said: and although they had spent long time in discovering their minds; yet answered he them upon the instant, and in affairs of consequence he had such a moving perswasion and power, as no man could exceed him, both in regard of his quick spirit and easie apprehension, as of the exercise and pain he had taken. For being Tiberius brothers sonne, whose successour also he was, he was enforced to be studious, seeing that Tiberius, who was of the same yeers, was in like manner excellently learned: Caius therefore enforced himself to imitate the Emperour Tiberius whose neer kinsman he was, and surpassed all those that were in Rome at that time; yet notwithstanding, all these great advantages, which his good instruction had bred in him, could not hinder the misfortune that befell him, by the abuse of his authority. So rare a thing it is to see

Caius given over to lust.

Caius builded a haven.

Caius an excellent Orator.

see them, who have liberty to do what they list without punishment, to govern themselves with modesty. In the beginning he took delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit and reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: but after he was given over to licentiousness, the affection that he bare them was changed; and in stead thereof, he grew in hatred of them from day to day: whereby they were enforced to conspire against him, and seek his ruin.

Now, as I have heretofore declared, Claudius understanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled, for this occasion was in such distrust, that he knew not what to do to save himself: but went and hid himself in a certain corner, where he was surpris'd, having no other cause to apprehend his danger, except his Nobility. For during the time that he lived a private man, he behaved himself modestly, kindly, and favourably unto all men, being well seen in the Sciences, and principally in the Greek tongue, shunning as much as in him lay, all tumult and train that might breed trouble. When as therefore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the palace was replenish'd with souldier-like fury and fear, and nothing reigned more in generall then confusion and disorder; the souldiers of the guard, who were the most experienced and hardy amongst the men of warre, consulted amongst themselves what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius death, in that they supposed that upon just occasion, he was done to death: for which cause they rather bethought themselves on that which concerned their estates, and how they might assure themselves in those dangers, seeing the Germanes were wholly bent against those, who had slaughtered Caius; rather incited thereunto of their own cruell natures, then of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the common-weal. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in fear of his life, the rather for that he saw Asprenas head, and the rest of the Nobility that were massacred, carried about to be seen: for this cause he kept himself in a certain place, which was onely accessible by certain steps or stairs, and hid himself therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the souldiers of the palace, called Gratus, being unable to discern who he was, in regard of the obscuritie of the place, and supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew neer unto him, to the intent he might the better know him: And when as Claudius besought him that he would depart and leave him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to those that followed him, This is Germanicus, let us take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiving that he was ready to be attached, and fearing lest they should put him to death in the like maner as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting unto them his innocencie, and how he had in no sort been either accessory or agent in that which had bin done. Whereupon Gratus beginning to smile, took him by the hand, saying, that he had no cause in that sort to suspect his life: For (said he) it becometh thee to pull up thy spirits, and to bethink thee how to govern an Empire, of which the gods (who have the care of the whole world) have despoiled Caius, to reward thy vertue with. Arise therefore and take possession of the throne of thine ancestors. This said, he lifted him on his shouldiers, for that Claudius could not walk on foot, through the fear and joy that he had conceived of that which had been told him.

Upon these speeches divers of the souldiers of the guard assembled about Gratus and perceiving that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of a milde nature, who all the time of his life intermeddled with nothing, and who in like sort had been often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that said, that the judgement of this matter pertained to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were unarmed, fled from them; yet could not Claudius go onward in his way; so weak and feeble felt he himself in his whole body. It fortun'd likewise, that they who carried his litter, perceiving his flight, fled away for fear, and left him, so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw to be thus drawn by the souldiers. Now when Gratus and his associates were arrived in the Court of the palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to think upon that which was to be done: thither also there flocked a great number of other souldiers unto them, who took pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselves to place him in the Imperiall dignity, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his brother, whose memory was much honoured among all those, who had at any time conversed with him. Moreover, they ripped up how many avaricious acts the Senate had committed, and how great errors the chiefeest Senators had default'd in,

A in, before the publike government was changed. Moreover, they considered upon the danger and difficultie of their actions then in hand, for that the government being administered by one onely man, would be dangerous for them, if he should obtain the same by any other means; whereas if Claudius should enjoy the same by their permission and good will, he would live them in remembrance who had favoured him, and would recompence them according to their merits. This was the effect of their discourse, which they held among themselves, or when they met with one another. Finally, all of them at length concluded upon this advice, and environed Claudius, and lifting him up upon their shoulders, they carried him into the army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finish that which they intended. There fell a debate also betwixt the Senators and citizens: For the Senate desirous to recover their former dignitie, and enforcing themselves to avoid the servitude that had befallen them by the out-rage of Tyrants, intended the maintenance of their offered good fortune. Contrariwise, the people envied them that dignity. And knowing that their Emperours should be as it were certain bridles, to restrain the avarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to see that Claudius was advanced: making their account that if he were created Emperour, they should avoid a civill warre like unto that which happened in Pompeius time.

The Senate knowing that Claudius was carried into the army by the souldiers, chose out some of their order, and now sent them as messengers in their behalf, to signifie unto him that he ought to use no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the charge of the common-weal to the Senate. That he both was and should be one of the Senators, and have the conduct of the common-weal, and dispose it according to law, perswading him to call unto his remembrance those grievous mischiefs, which the former tyrants had wrought in the common-weal, and what dangers he himself had also suffered with them, during the reign of Caius their late Emperour. That it should ill become him, who had detested the fury of others tyrannie at such time as they used outrages, now willingly to be drawn to oppose himself against his countrey. That if he would obey them, and continue to expresse the vertue and constancie of his life, which in times past he led with commendation, he should obtain those honours which free citizens could afford him; and in suffering himself to be governed by laws, to the end he might have part in the commandment, and to be commanded in his turn, he should obtain the praise of vertue. That if he should not be dissuaded by the slaughter of Caius, which was fresh in memory, for their own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They also alleadged, that they were furnished with men of warre, with store of armour, and a great number of domestick servants, all which they would imploy against him: But over and above these things, they had farre greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who are wont to fight for those who maintain vertue and goodnesse. They solemnly protested also for their own parts, that they were of that minde, that there was nothing more honest and just, then to fight for their liberty and countrey. The Embassadors that brought this message, were Veranius and Brocchus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They prostrating themselves on their knees before him, humbly besought him that he would not draw the common-weal into civill warre. And seeing that Claudius was inclosed with a great company of men of warre, in respect of whom the Consuls were of no sorte, they besought him that it would please him to demand the government at the Senates hands, and receive it from them if he were resolved to be Emperour; for that it would be an act more holy, and coupled with justice and good hap, if he should obtain the same with their good will, and not in despight of those, who would vouchsafe it him willingly.

CHAP. III.

The sedition that arose between the Senate and the people.

Although Claudius knew with what presumption the Senate had sent this Embassage, yet did he modestly entertain the same for the present. But supposing that it stood very little with his security to commit himself to their trust, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the souldiers, who promised him their utmost endeavour, and by the incitation of King Agrippa, he determined in no sort to let the sovereignty escape out of his hands, in that it was so willingly and freely bestowed on him when he thought least on it. After that Agrippa had performed all those duties unto Caius which were requisite for such a one as had been by him advanced to honour, and having taken his body and laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the souldiers of his guard, and certified them them that Caius was yet alive, and for that he found himself sick of those wounds that he had received, he sent to seek for Physicians. But afterward, understanding that Claudius was taken by the men of warre, he thrust so much that he got himself passage, and came unto him, whom he found altogether dismaid, & ready to surrender all things into the Senates hands, and encouraged him, and incited him to take upon him the government of the Empire which the men of warre had offered him. Which done, he departed, and was suddenly sent for by the Senate, whither he resorted altogether perfumed with odors, as if at that time he were returned from some banquet, and had known nothing of that which had happened: He therefore asked the Senators what was become of Claudius, who certified him of the truth; and besides that required him to give them his opinion and counsell as touching the present affairs: his answer was, that he was ready to adventure his life in the behalf of the Senate; yet by the way he told them that they ought to have an especiall regard of the common-weal, rather then all the pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords of an Empire, had need of arms and men to maintain themselves, lest being weak and unfurnished, they should be deceived in their expectations. The Senate replied that they had great store of furniture, and that they would contribute money; that they had good store of men of warre, to whom they would annex their slaves and give them liberty. But Agrippa replied, Would God, grave fathers, that you were able to perform the matters you intend; yet will I not fear to discover that unto you, which concerneth you neerly. You know well, that the army which is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who have been long time trained up in feats of arms; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but men gathered together, and such as you couple them with, are the very scum of your slaves; who are both intractable and untrained. We shall therefore enter fight against expert souldiers, and commit our fortunes to such men as scarcely know how to draw their swords: I rather think it meet that we send unto Claudius such men, as may perswade him to give over the Empire. And to perform this message, behold my self in a readinesse to be commanded by you.

To this effect spake Agrippa; and hereunto the Senators accorded, and sent him to Claudius, appointing him certain others to accompany him. As soon as he came to Claudius, he secretly discovered unto him in what perplexity the Senate was, and gave him instructions to answer and demean himself like an Emperour, and to shew his dignitie and power. Whereupon Claudius gave the Embassadors this answer; That he wondred not that the Senate were so unwilling to be commanded by a Sovereigne, in regard of that cruelty which the forepassed Emperours had used to their destruction. But for the present, they should taste of his mercie, and feel his moderate rule; and they should live under the government of such a one, who although in name he had the Imperiall authoritie; yet that in effect he would govern all things by their disposition. For which cause he wished them in no sort to distrust him, whom as they themselves could witnesse, they have seen and known to have dealt vertuously and justly in many affairs, although the state of times had been far different. Those that were sent from the Senate hearing these words, returned back again. But Claudius instantly assembled his men of warre, and exacted an oath of fidelitie from them, bestowing on every one of them who were of his guard in way of largesse, five thousand drachmes, amounting to some 25. pound a man of our sterling money. He presented their Captains also with presents answerable to their qualities, promising to perform no lesse bounty to all the rest of the men of warre, in what place soever they were. Hereupon the Consuls assembled the Senate in the Temple of Jupiter the victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselves through the fear they had of that which should be spoken: others departed out of the City, and resorted to their countrey farms, foreseeing with themselves the issue of all these things: and perceiving that their hope of liberty was lost, they thought it farre better for them to be exempt from danger, and to passe their life in repose, though it were with subjection, then to be altogether uncertain of their securitie and safety, by maintaining the dignity of the Senators: yet about some hundred of them drew themselves together and no more. Now whilest they were consulting upon that which they were to do, they suddenly heard a shout of souldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuse them an Emperour, and not to suffer their State to be lost through a multitude of governours: and to this effect spake they, lest the government should be given to divers, and not to one. This course of theirs gave little content to the Senators, both in regard of the losse of that liberty which they expected, as through the good liking they had of Claudius, notwithstanding there were some that pretended some hope to be advanced both in respect of the nobility of their race, as in regard of their alliance that they had by marriage with the Cæsars. For Marcus Municius, a man of himself of noble descent, and

A and who had married Julia Cains sister, stood up to demand the sovereign government: but the Consuls restrained him, alleading excuse upon excuse. Another Minutianus also, one of Cains tutors withdrew Valerius Asiaticus from thinking on those things: and there had happened as great a slaughter as had ever been heard of, had any of these had the liberty to desire the Empire, or oppose themselves against Claudius. For amongst other, the sencers, who were of no small number, they of the watch, and the saylers joyned themselves together with the men of warre. They therefore that pretended to demand the Empire, gave over their suits, partly in the cities behalf, partly for their own private securitie sake.

About the day-spring Chareas and his companions went forth to debate the matter with the souldiers: but they seeing by the beckning with their hands they would draw them to silence, and were upon the instant to fall into discourse, made a great noise to cut them off from proceeding any further, for that all of them were earnestly affected to have an Emperor and Sovereigne Lord, and required with all expedition that they might have one proclaimed, and knowne. At that time the Senate were so distracted, both for the maner how they should command, as for the means they ought to use to cause themselves to be obeyed, considering the souldiers set light by them; and those that were confederates in the death of Cains, suffered not the Senate to obey the souldiers. At length Chareas being unable to conceal his passion wherewith he was surprized, and hearing that they asked for a Monarch, promised that he would give them one, if they would bring him a token from Eutychus, who was the wagoner to the green band, whom Cains had loved extremely, in so much as he employed his souldiers in servile labours, as to build him stables for his horses, and reproached them with divers like matters, telling them that he would bring them Claudius head, shewing them that it was a matter ill becomming them, if after a mad man they should commend the Empire to a fool. Yet none of these words could divert them from their purpose: but all of them drew their swords, and with displayed ensignes marched towards Claudius to unite themselves with those, who had already bound themselves by an oath to serve him faithfully. So that the Senate was abandoned, and destitute of all defence; so as there was no difference betwixt private men and Consuls. All of them were astonished and confused, not knowing what to do, because they had thus provoked Claudius displeasure against them. And now fell they to reviling one another, in testimonie of the repentance they conceived for these their proceedings. Whereupon Sabinus one of those who had murdered Cains, arose and protested that he would sooner cut his own throat, then consent to the establishment of Claudius, or behold with his eyes the misery and thraldome of his country: he likewise encouraged Chareas, telling him that he had deserved very little by cutting off Cains, if he thought to live without the liberty of his country. To which he answered, that he made no account of his life; yet that he intended to sound Claudius minde, and with this resolution they concluded. Mean-while certain of the Senators fought on everie side to break thorow the midst and thickest of the souldiers, to go and do reverence and homage to Claudius: amongst whom was Pompeius one of the Consuls, whom the men of warre accused to be one of the principall actors to incite the Senate to recover their libertie; and they drew their swords against him. And if Claudius had not restrained them, they had surely dispatched him: but he made him sit down by him, and by that means delivered him from the danger. The other Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honourably; but some of them were wounded even then when they pressed forth to salute Claudius. Aponius retired himself sore wounded, and the rest were in great danger to lose their lives. But King Agrippa drawing neer unto Claudius, desired him to use as much lenitie as was possible in him towards the Senators, for that if any mischief should betide them, he should have no other persons to command. To the which counsell of his, Claudius gave place, and assembled the Senate in the Palace, causing himself to be carried thorow the citie in the company of his souldiers, who marched before him, doing much mischief to the common people. But amongst those that slew Cains, Chareas & Sabinus were come out into the streets, notwithstanding they were forbidden by Pollus, whom not long before Claudius had made Captain of his guard. And as soon as Claudius came into the Palace, whither he assembled his friends, he pronounced sentence against Chareas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble, yet was he condemned for this, because he was perfidious, whereupon he was adjudged to die, to give example to others, to the end that Princes and Emperours may hereafter live in safety. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and divers other Romanes. It is said of Chareas, that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expressed not onely in that he changed not his countenance, but also by the reproaches which he gave Lupus who wept. For when as Lupus was putting off his cloaths, and complained of the cold that he felt, he taunted him thus, alluding to his name which was Lupus; That never any cold did harm to a wolf. Furthermore, when he came to the place of execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the spectacle, he asked the souldier that was appointed to behead him, if he were a cunning headsmen, and whether he had a new sword, wishing him to use that wherewith he murdered Caius. His death was happy, for he received but one stroke, whereas Lupus was faint-hearted, and received divers, because he stretched not out his neck freely. Some few dayes after, at such time as the Romanes solemnized their expiations, and that every one honoured the memory of his dear friend, they gave Chareas a part of that honour, and cast his portion into the fire, saying, That was to deface and purge their ingratitude, whereof they were guiltie towards him. Thus ended Chareas his life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not onely absolved him, but also suffered him to exercise his office, as beforerime he had done: yet thought he that he should do amisse and against justice, if he falsified his faith to his associates and confederates, for which cause he shortned his own dayes, thrusting his sword thorow his body to the very hilts.

Continently after this, Claudius cashiered all those of the souldiers whom he suspected, and published an Ediēt, by which he confirmed the kingdome to Agrippa, that Caius had given him, accompanying his bounty with many praises; annexing moreover unto his government all that which Herod his grandfather had possessed, to wit, Judæa, and Samaria, which, in that they were as one lawfull inheritance, appertained unto him. He gave him also out of his own dominions, Abela and all the countrey about the mount Libanus, that in times past appertained to Lyfania. And he caused the alliance that was past betwixt them twain, to be engraven and registred in an open place of the city of Rome. He took from Antiochus the kingdome that he had, and gave him in exchange a portion of Cilicia and Comagenæ. He set Alexander Lyfimachus Alabarcha at libertie, who had been his old friend, and sometimes Governour in Arabia, and otherwhiles his mother Antonias steward, who had been committed prisoner through Caius displeasure, and married Bernice Agrippas daughter, with his sonne Marcus: which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was espoused, was afterwards married with her father Agrippas allowance to Herod his brother, for whom Agrippa begd of Claudius the kingdome of Chalcis. At that very time the Jews, that were in the Citie of Alexandria, mutined against the Greeks. For after Caius death the nation of the Jews, which had been oppressed during his reign, and injuriously dealt withall by the Alexandrines, recovered their former courage, and instantly fell to arms. For which cause Claudius gave commission to the governour of Egypt, to pacifie and appease that uproare. He sent also his letters patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the request of the two kings Agrippa and Herod, to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Cesar Augustus Germanicus, Father of the people, signifieth this that followeth: Understanding that the Jews inhabitants in Alexandria, and for this cause called Alexandrines, have at all times enjoyed the self same priviledges of the Citie, which the ancient and first Alexandrines have had: Which favours they have obtained by the largesse of those Princes, that were our predecessours, as it hath been plainly made known unto us, as well by letters which have been written unto us, as by confirmed decrees: And that since Alexandria hath been annexed to our Empire by Cesar Augustus, their priviledges have continued in force during the severall successions of many of our governours, which rights of theirs have never been called in question, no not in that time when Aquila was governour in Alexandria: Since in like sort Cesar Augustus hath not letted them, but when the chieftain of their nation was dead, they might establish other substitutes and governours in his place, willing that all of them should yeeld him obedience in observation of their laws and customes, without constraint or impulsion to do any thing contrarie to their religion: yet notwithstanding the Alexandrines have mutined against the Jews, being in the Citie of Alexandria in the time of the Emperour Caius, by reason of the folly and frenzie of Caius, who disgraced and oppressed the Nation of the Jews, because they would not violate their religion, nor acknowledge the said Caius for a god. Our will and pleasure is, that no one of the priviledges of the nation of the Jews be abolished, by reason of Caius frenzie; but my minde is to maintain those which heretofore have been given them, to the end they may continue and live according to their ancient laws and customes: Commanding you and every one of you very care.

A carefully to provide, that after the publication of this our ordinance, they be in no sort troubled. This was the tenour of that ordinance which was made in favour of the Jews in Alexandria.

But that which was generally made in favour of those, who were dispersed thorow the whole world, was to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, High Priest, Father of the people, elected Consul the second time, signifieth that which ensueth. Our well-beloved friends, the Kings Agrippa and Herod, have required us, that we will permit all those Jews, that live under the Romane Empire, to use the same laws and priviledges which they have used heretofore, as we have granted to the Jews that dwell in Alexandria. Which suit of theirs we have willingly granted, not onely in favour of those that require the same, but also for that I think them worthy such a grace: for whom I have been intreated, in regard of the fidelity and friendship they have alwaies expressed towards the Romans. My pleasure therefore is, that no Citie either Grecian or otherwise, shall deny any priviledge, from whence they shall be excluded, for that since the Emperour Augustus time they have never been exempted from them. It standeth with reason therefore, that henceforth the Jews, who live under our Empire, of what place soever they be, may observe their ancient customes, without any contradiction: Giving them to understand, that hereafter they use our clemencie so much the more moderately, without neglecting the religion of other nations, in retaining their own. And our will is, that this present ordinance be published, by the Magistrates of Cities, Colonies and countries of Italy, and be sent unto Kings and forrain Princes, by fit Embassadors, within thirty dayes at the least, to the end that they should be in such sort set up, that they may be seen and read by all those that passe by.

AGRIPPA'S return into Iudæa.

BY these Edicts of Claudius Caesar, which he sent both to Alexandria and other parts of the world, it plainly appeareth how well affected he was towards the nation of the Jews. And presently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of honour, he sent him back into his kingdome to govern the same, commanding all his Presidents and Lieutenants in his Provinces, thorow which he was to passe, to give him a friendly and honourable convoy. But he having wisely and happily dispatched his affairs, returned in all haste. As soon as he came to Jerusalem, he offered his sacrifices of thanksgiving which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the law. He caused also divers Nazarites to be pould and offered in gift that chain of gold that Caius had given him: which was of the same weight the iron chain was of wherewith his royall hands were manacled, in memorie of the adversitie he had past, and the testimonie of the exchange thereof into better fortune: commanding that it should be hanged up in the Temple, and over the chamber of the treasury, to testifie unto those that should behold the same, that the highest estates are subject to alterations, and that God can raise men again from obscuritie to happy fortune. For this chain that hanged in the Temple, being consecrated to God, manifestly expressed unto all men, that King Agrippa was upon a very small occasion despoiled of his former dignitie, and made prisoner: and then a little while after that he, being delivered from his bonds, was raised and exalted to a famous kingdome: to signify thereby, that humane affairs are of that nature, that that which is the greatest may be easily overthrown, and that which is declining, may recover again his ancient honour and dignitie. When as therefore Agrippa had duely and devoutly acknowledged Gods mercies, he deposed the high Priest Theophilus the sonne of Ananus, and bestowed that honour on Simon surnamed Canshara the sonne of Boethus. This Simon had two brothers, and Boethus was their father, whose daughter had been married to King Herod, as heretofore it hath been spoken. Simon held the Priesthood with his brethren and his father, in such sort, as beforetime the three sonnes of Simon high Priest, sonne of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as we have declared in our former books. After the King had given order for the Priesthood, he thought good to recompence the good affection that they of Jerusalem had born unto him: for which cause he acquitted them of those tributes that every family paid, knowing well that it became him to shew kindnesse unto them, who had been faithfull and well affected towards him. He created Silas, who had been his companion in many dangers, General of all his army. Not long after, certain young men that were Dorites under the colour of constancy in case of religion, who also had daily expressed in their actions an unbridled rashnesse, brought the image of Caesar into the Temple of the Jews, and erected it in that place, which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who construed it as an act that tended to the abolition of the religion of their country: for which cause, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was Governour of Syria, and complained against these Dorites, who was no lesse displeased with the action then he himself. For he supposed that such breach of religion was the means to further impiety, and for that cause he wrote to those which had attempted this innovation, somewhat sharply, to this effect following:

P etronius, Lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to the Magistrates of the country of Doria, health: Whereas Cæsar hath published an Edict, by which he permitteth the Jews to live according to their laws and customs, some one amongst you have been so presumptuous to contradict the same in effect (although in words you protest that you obey him) and do all that which you can, to hinder the Jews from enjoying their Synagogue, in so much as in the same you have planted Cæsars image, not onely thereby opposing your selves against the Jews, but also against the Emperour himself, whose image might have been better placed in his own Temple, then in a forraign Temple: and you have placed it in their Synagogue, whereas by right everyone ought to be master of his place, according to Cæsars judgement: For it should be very ridiculous in me to alleadge mine own judgement after that of Cæsars, who hath granted the Jews the liberty to live according to their laws and customs, and hath commanded that they should converse in equall freedome among the Greeks. For these causes I command you, that they, who have been so bold as to contemne Augustus decree (against whom their own Magistrates have been displeased, excusing themselves that this accident happened not by their motion, but by the fury of the common people) be brought before me by the Captain Proculus Vestilius, to yeeld a reason of that which they have done; exhorting the Magistrates, that if they will not be accounted parties in this contempt, they labour to discover those that are guilty, unto Proculus, and give order that no sedition or violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they affect, although we and the most honoured King Agrippa, whom I take for my good and speciall friend, labour nothing more then that the nation of the Jews should not assemble and take arms under colour of their defence. And to the end that whatsoever Augustus hath ordained as touching this matter, may be the better known unto all men, I have annexed his Edict which he published in Alexandria: and although they are sufficiently known unto all men, yet hath the most honoured King Agrippa read them unto me, at such time as I sate in my tribunall seat; concluding according to right, that the Jews ought not to be excluded nor hindered from enjoying those benefits, which are granted unto them by Cæsar: I therefore charge all men, that henceforward they take heed lest they seek any occasion of mutinie or sedition, and that every one live according to his religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter; both to attend that which was past, as also to prevent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa took the Priesthood from Simon Cantabara, and gave it again to Jonathan the sonne of Anani, whom he esteemed to be more worthy then the other. But Jonathan declared that he was not desirous of this dignitie, for in effect he refused it, saying, O King, I most willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaseth you to bestow upon me; and know well that it is a dignitie which of your own freewill you bestow upon me; notwithstanding that God judgeth me unworthy. It sufficeth me that I have once been invested with the sacred habit: for at that time I wore it with more holinesse, then I can now receive it at this present; yet notwithstanding if it please you to know one that is more worthy of this honour then my self, I will inform you of one. My Liege, I have a brother, who towards God and you is pure and innocent, whom I dare commend unto you for a most fit man for that dignitie. The King took great pleasure in these his words, and leaving Jonathan, he bestowed the Priesthood on Matthias his brother, according as Jonathan advised him: and not long after this, Masius succeeded in Petronius room, and took upon him the government of Syria.

CHAP. VII.

AGRIPPAS acts untill the time of his death.

SILAS was made Generall over the Kings army: and for that he had alwaies been faithfull unto him, and had never forsaken him in any danger that was offered, without partaking the utmost extremity, but had alwayes adventured on the greatest perils in respect of his intire and constant resolution, he made his account, that being so firm a friend to the King, he should also be partaker & companion with him in the honour. For which cause in all things whatsoever, he submitted not himself to the King, but challenged to himself a liberty to speak what him listed. For this cause he grew hatefull in the Kings sight, for that in particular he boasted of himself beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memory of those adversities the King had past, the rather to expresse how affectionate he had been toward him, and his continuall talk was nothing else but of those travels he had endured. Now for that he observed no measure in this his discourse, the King took it as an injury intended to his honour, and was offended with the unbridled licence of the mans prattle. For nothing sounder more harsh in a mans eare, then the memory of his fore-passed misery, and it is but the fault of a fool to rip up the courtesies he hath employed on another man. Finally, Silas grievously provoked the Kings displeasure against himself, that rather subscribing to his wrath then his wit, he not onely dispossessed Silas of his Generals room, but also sent him bound into his countrey in that place to be held prisoner. This notwithstanding, time asswaged his displeasure, and the King drawing himself into better consideration, and remembering himself how many travels Silas had endured in his behalf, he revoked the sentence that he had pronounced. At such time therefore as he was ready to celebrate the festivall day of his birth, and all his subjects were addrested to take their pleasure, he speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker thereof, and banquet with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had just cause to be displeased, concealed it not from those who were sent unto him, but spake unto them after this maner: To what honour doth the King invite me at this present, to the intent incontinently to deprive me thereof? For he hath not onely deprived me of those honours which he bestowed upon me, in acknowledgement of the good affection I have alwayes shewed unto him, but he hath altogether spoiled me, and contumeliously intreated me: but if he think that he can restrain me from speaking freely, he deceiveth himself. For my conscience knoweth how many hazards I have delivered him from, and as long as I breathe, I will ring it in all mens eares, how many travels I have endured for his conservation and honour, in recompence whereof I am at this day in bonds, and shut up in an obscure prison, which I will never forget. Yea and when my soul shall depart out of this body, she shall bear with her the remembrance of those benefits I have imployed on him. These words spake he with a loud voice, willing them to relate the same unto King Agrippa; who seeing that he was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in prison.

After this, the King began to fortifie the walls of Jerusalem, on the side of the new town, upon the common charge, increasing them both in length and breadth: and might he have thorowly finished them, it had been a fortress invincible, by all humane force. But Marcus the Governour of Syria certified Cesar what the work was, and Claudius suspecting some commotion, wrote expressly to Agrippa, commanding him thence-forward to desist from further building of the walls, according to that form wherein he began: whereunto he would not disobey. This King Agrippa was of nature so ready to exercise liberalitie, and took so great pleasure to use his magnificence towards all sorts of nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to shew courtesie unto all men, and to purchase good esteem, being every way different in nature and disposition from King Herod his predeceffour. For Herod was naturally malicious, extreme in punishing men, and irreconcilable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that he loved the Grecians better then the Jews. For he beautified those cities that belonged to strangers, and gave them money, and erected them baths, and sumptuous Theaters, and Temples, and in some of them galleries: but as touching the cities of the Jews, he bestowed not this bounty on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of. Contrariwise, King Agrippa was very courteous and lowly, and equally imparted his bountie unto all men. He was courteous unto strangers, and testified no lesse by the bountie he bestowed on them. To his countrey-men he behaved himself himself affably, and in especiall he was mercifull to all those that were in misery. For which cause his ordinarie court and the place he took most pleasure in, was Jerusalem. He was a diligent observer of the laws of his countrey, and lived religiously, and with as great pietie as was possible: neither passed there one day wherein he offered not sacrifice. It happened at one time that a certain cunning Lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Jerusalem, had assembled the people by reason of the kings absence, who for the present was in Caesarea. In which assembly he alledged many things against him, that he was a prophane man, and that upon just cause he was forbidden to enter the Temple, in that it was not lawfull nor decent for those that were unclean, to enter therein. These words of Simons thus wrongfully urged against him, were signified to the King by certain letters sent him by the Governour of the Citie: when as therefore he sate him down in the Theater, he commanded that very Simon to sit next him, and in peaceable and kinde maner he spake thus unto him: Tell me, I pray thee, what thing thou seeest fault worthy, or done contrary to the law, in that which is done here? Simon having not any thing to reply, besought him to pardon him. The King grew friends with him farre sooner then it could be imagined, resolving with himself that mercie doth farre better become a King, then wrath; and that moderation is more requisite, then haughty courage; so as after he had bestowed certain presents on Simon, he dismissed him. Now although he had many reparations in divers places, yet honoured he those of Beryth above all the rest, and builded them a Theater surpassing all other in sumptuousnesse and beauty: and besides that, he made them a sumptuous Amphitheater, and baths and porches: in which he neither spared cost, neither scantled the beauty and greatnesse of the works in any sort. The dedication also of these things was celebrated with great pomp and magnificence: he also made great shews and plaies in the Theater, in which there were all sorts of musick and recreation. He made also divers turnaments in the Amphitheater, expressing in all things the greatnesse of his magnificence; and being desirous to delight the people with a combate, he gathered all the malefactors that he could get, and made two severall companies of seven hundreth apiece, and brought them together to fight, to the end that in skirmishing they might receive their punishment; and besides, that by this warlike exercise he might present the people with a pastime concluded with the punishment of wicked men: for each of these combatants slew one another.

After that he had finished these above-named buildings in Beryth, he resorted to Tiberias a city of Galilee, and was admired of all the other Kings, so that Antiochus king of Comagena came to visit him: the like did Samfingeran king of the Emesenians, Corys king of Armenia the lesse, and Polemon Lord of Pontus; and besides all these, Herod Prince of Chalcis and his brother, all whom he received and entertained most magnificently and amiably, to shew his greatnesse; to the end that all men might perceive, that he was deservedly honoured with the presence of so many Kings. And during the time, that these Princes were with him, Marfus the governour of Syria visited him likewise, whom, to the end he might expresse the reverence he bare to the Romanes, he met with, seven furlongs off from the Citie. This interview of so many Kings was the originall of that discontent that grew betwixt him and Marfus; for whilest he sate in his litter, he sent for these other Kings. But Marfus suspected this concord and so great amitie, supposing that this agreement of so many Kings, would be no wayes profitable or beneficiall to the Romanes. For which cause he presently sent unto them, charging them with all expedition to return each of them into their own countries: which strict commission of his Agrippa took in ill part, and for this occasion he conceived scarce kindly of Marfus. He took the Priesthood from Matthias, and gave it to Aeloneus the sonne of Citharus. After he had reigned three whole yeeres over Judaea, he came to Caesarea, which in times past was called the tower of Straton, and there made he sports in honour of Caesar, ordaining a certain feast for his conservation, to the celebration whereof there were assembled a great number of those, who were of estate and dignitie thorow the whole countrey. On the second day of this solemnitie, he shewed himself being apparelled in a Robe of silver, made with admirable workmanship; and came in the same to the Theater in the morning: Whereas the first reflex of the rising of the Sunne beating upon his Robe, he shined after such a sort, that all those that beheld him, were seized with reverence and fear. Whereupon certain sycophants (which did not a little dishonour him) exclaimed one on the one side, the other on the other, saluting him for a God, and in speaking to him, cried out thus: Be mercifull unto us, hitherto have we feared thee as a man, but henceforward we will confesse and acknowledge thee to be of a nature more excellent then mortall frailtie can attain unto. Agrippa reproved them not for using these words: neither rejected he their palpable and detestable flattery. But not long after, he looking upwards, perceived an Owl over his head

A head parched upon a cord, and knew the same incontinently, that he was but a message of his misfortune: whereas before-time he had denounced unto him his felicity, and conceived thereupon a most hearty and inward griefe. And suddenly he was seized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with very great vehemency: for which cause turning his eyes towards his friends, he spake unto them after this maner: Behold him (said he) whom you esteeme for a God, condemned to die, and destiny shall apparently convince you of those flattering and false speeches, which you have lately used in my behalfe. For I, who by you have been adored as one immortall, am under the hands of death. But I must willingly entertain that which God pleaseth to send me: For I have not lived in obscuritie, but in so great and wonderfull felicity, that each one of you have reared and held me happy.

Whilest he spake thus, his griefes augmented in such sort, that he was brought almost to his last: for which cause he was with all expedition conveighed into his royall Palace, and the rumour was spread in every place, that very shortly he would be dead. For which cause the people with their wives and children put on sackcloth, according to the custome of the country, to the end they might solicit Gods mercy in the Kings behalfe, and all the City was filled with tears and lamentations. The King that lay in an upper chamber, and looking down into the court, saw them lying thus on the earth, could not refrain himself from tears. And after he had for the space of five dayes without ceasing been tormented with griping in his belly, he gave up the ghost in the fiftie fourth yeer of his age, and the seventh yeer of his reign. For he had reigned foure yeers under the Empire of Caesar (having first of all governed Philips Tetrarchy three yeers, to which was annexed the signory of Herod in the fourth yeer) and three yeers under the Empire of Claudius Caesar, during which time he governed over the abovenamed countries: and moreover, over Juda, Samaria and Cæsarea. His revenue amounted to twelve hundredth myriades, besides which, he made many loans. For in that he was very liberall in giving, he spent farre more then his revenue, and spared not any thing to shew himselfe magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his brother Prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the Kings lieutenant and friend, agreed between themselves to send Aristo one of their trustiest servants to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had been commanded by the King.

Thus died King Agrippa, leaving behinde him a sonne called Agrippa, seventeen yeers old; and three daughters, one of which that was called Bernice, was married to Herod his fathers brother, when she was sixteen yeers old. The two other were Mariamne and Drusilla: this Mariamne being of the age of ten yeers, was promised in marriage by her father, to Julius Archelaus Chelcias sonne: and Drusilla which was six yeers old, was promised also to Euphanes, sonne to the King of Comagena.

After *Agrippa*s death, they of Cæsarea & Sebastia forgot themselves of those benefits they had received from him, and used him no lesse despightfully, then as if he had been their utter enemy. For they reproachfully abused him after his death, and reviled him in such sort, as it is unseemely to report the same. Furthermore, all the men of warre, who were at that time many in number, went unto the Kings lodging, and with one accord seized the statues of the Kings daughters, and carried them to the brothell house; where, after they had placed them, they uttered all the indignities they could possibly, practising such shameful matters, as they may not be expressed. Besides this, resting themselves in the publike places, they banquetted in the open street, wearing chaplets of flowers on their heads, and perfuming themselves with odours to sacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for joy that the King was dead. Thus expressed they their ingratitude not onely towards their king Agrippa, who had bestowed so many liberalities on them; but also towards Herod his grandfather, who had builded their Cities, and to his extreme charge erected their ports and temples. At that time Agrippa, the deceased *Agrippa*s sonne was at Rome, and was brought up under the Emperour Claudius. When Cæsar understood how those of Cæsarea and Sebastia had injuriously dealt with Agrippa, he was sore displeased, and moved with their ingratitude: and his purpose was, to send the younger Agrippa with all expedition to take possession of the kingdom of his father, and therewithall to discharge himselfe of his oath: but divers of his freemen and friends, who were in great credit with him, dissuaded him from the same, alledging that it would be a dangerous matter to commit the greatnesse of such a Kingdom to a young man, who scarcely had as yet attained to the age of eighteen yeers: and for whom it was impossible to support the care of so great a Kingdom, considering that if he were at mans estate, he should finde himselfe overburthened with the charge of a Kingdom. This advice of theirs was allowed by Cæsar, and for this cause he sent Cuspius Fadus to governe Judæa, and the whole realme; honouring his dead friend in this, in that he would not suffer

He gave especiall commiffion also, that Fadus should sharply punish those of Cæsarea and Sebastæ, for the outrages they had offered to his deceased friend, and the excesse that was committed against his daughters, who were yet living; commanding him to transport the companies of the Cæsareans and Sebastens, and the five Roman legions into the countrey of Pontus to serve in that place, and to take those Roman souldiers that bare armes in Syria, to serve in that place: yet notwithstanding this commandement of his, they were not displaced. For they sent Embassadors to Claudius to appease him, and by this means they obtained the favour to remain in Judæa. After this they gave an entrance to those most grievous mischiefs and calamities that befell the Jews: for they spred the seed of the warre which was awakened under Florus government. And for that cause, after that Vespasian had obtained the victory, as it shall be hereafter declared, he caused them to depart out of that province, and made them seek their habitation elsewhere.

CHAP. I.

The dissention between the Philadelphians and the Jews: and of the Ephod which was the sacerduall stole.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1.
Cassius Longinus Prefect of Syria.

Fadus punisheth the Jews for their insurrection against the Philadelphians.

After King Agrippa decease (as we have heretofore declared in our former Book) the Emperour Claudius sent Cassius Longinus to succeed Marsus in the government of Syria, whom he displaced of that honour in memory of Agrippa, who during his life-time had oftentimes required by his letters, that he should not suffer Marsus to govern the estate of Syria. As soon as Cassius Fadus came into Jewry to take charge of that countrey, which he was to govern under Cæsar, he found the Jews that dwelt on the other side of Jordan in an uproare, who had taken arms against the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certain village called Mia, which was stored with valiant men at armes. Now had those who inhabit beyond Jordan, armed themselves in this manner, without the consent of their Governours; and had slain a great number of the Philadelphians. Which when Fadus understood, he was sore displeased, for that they had not reserved the cause to his hearing, and opened their griefes they had conceived against the Philadelphians, but were so bold, of their own authoritie, and without fear, to betake themselves to their weapons. Having therefore apprehended some three of them who had been principals

A pals and authours of the sedition, he commanded them to prison, and executed one of them called Annibaz, and banished the other two whose names were Amaram and Elazar.

B Anon after this, Tholomæus the Archthiefe was also taken, and brought unto him, who commanded him to be executed, in that he had done many robberies in Idumæa and Arabia; and by this means all the countrey of Judæa was cleared of all theeves, by the care and providence of Fadus. After this he sent for the high Priests, and the Governours of Jerusalem, commanding them, according to the Emperours direction, that they should deliver up into the Castle of Antonia the long and sacred robe, which the high Priest only was accustomed to weare; to the end that it might be at the Romans disposition, as in times past it had been. This command of his they durst not contradict, yet notwithstanding, they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Jerusalem with a great power, for feare the Jewes, by reason of this injunction, should grow to rebellion) first, that it might be lawfull for them to send their Embassadors unto Cæsar, to beseech him that the Sacred Robe might remaine in their custody. Secondly, that it might please them to expect the answer which Cæsar would returne upon this their request. Fadus gave them this answer, that he permitted them to send their Embassadors to Rome, provided, that beforehand they delivered him their children for hostages. Which when they had readily performed, the Embassadors were sent away. Now when they came to Rome, the younger Agrippa (who was his sonne that lately dyed) knowing the cause of their coming, and being ordinarily accustomed to attend upon Cæsar (according as we have heretofore declared) besought Cæsar, that he would grant the Jewes their request; as touching the sacred Robe, and that it might please him to signifie no lesse unto Fadus. On this his petition Claudius gave the Embassadors audience, and told them that he favoured their suit, willing them to be thankfull to Agrippa, upon whose suit hee respected them, and allowed of their demands; and besides this answer, he delivered them a letter to this effect.

Claudius Cæsar Germanicus, Consul of the people, Consul created the fift time, Emperor the fourth time, Father of the country the tenth time, to the Magistrates of Jerusalem, the Senate, people, and all the nation of the Jewes, health. Being requir'd by our welbelov'd Agrippa, whom I both have, and at this present doe bring up with me, and whom I know to be most devout, I have heard your Embassadors, who were admitted to my presence by his meanes, and have received their thanks for the benefits I have bestowed on your nation: I have also willingly inclined to that instant and expresse request you have made unto me; and it is my pleasure, the Sacred Robe of the High Priest, and the holy Miter remaine in your custody, in such manner, as our most deare and right honoured friend Phellex heretofore ordained: To which demand of yours I vouchsafe my allowance: first in regard of mine owne piety, and for that I desire that every one should serve God according to his owne religion: for that I am resolved, that in so doing, I shall gratifie King Herod and young Aristobolus, whose piety towards me I am privy to, and whose good affection towards you I can witnesse, with whom I have had divers occasions of friendship, both in regard of their vertue, as for the honour that I beare unto them. I have also written to this effect to Cassius Fadus mine Agent: The names of those who have received my letters, are Cornelius the son of Ceron, Trypon the son of Thendion, Dorubæus the son of Nathaneel, and John the son of John: Given the eight and twentieth of June, in the yeere wherein Rufus and Pompejus Silvanus were Consuls. At that same time Herod, who was Agrippas brother that had lately deceased, to whose hands in times past the government of Chalcis had beene committed, required the Emperour Claudius to grant him the power over the Temple, and the sacred vestments and necessities, and the authority of choosing the High Priest. All which he obtained, and from that time forward untill the end of the warre of the Jewes, this power remained in all his successors. According to this authority Herod deposed Cambyses from the Priesthood, and gave the succession thereof to Ioseph the sonne of Caneus.

ping with her, he laid his hand on her belly, whilest she lay asleep: and him thought, that he heard a voice that commanded him to take away his hand from off her belly, lest he should crush the fruit that was therein, which by Gods providence should have a happy beginning, and no lesse fortunate ending. Monobazus was sore moved at this voice, and as soon as he awoke, he told it to his wife; and afterwards when the childe was borne, he called him Izates: Besides, he had another elder sonne by the same wife, who was called Monobazus, according to his own name. And he had also other sonnes by his other wives: yet notwithstanding Izates was most manifestly his best beloved, and so cherished by him, as if he had been his onely begotten sonne. For which cause, his other brothers envied him: which increased their hatred, for that all the rest of them were aggrieved, because Monobazus made most account of Izates. The father manifestly perceived all this, yet did he pardon them, knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the desire that every one of them had to be best esteemed by his father. Notwithstanding, being affraid lest some mis-hap should betide Izates, by reason of the hatred his brethren bare unto him, he gave him many great gifts, and sent him to Abemerigus, who reigned at that time in a fort called Spasinus, committing his sonnes life into his hands. Abemerigus also entertained him with kinde affection, and loved him in such sort, that in proesse of time he gave him Samacha his daughter to wife; and for her dowrie he gave him a countrey of great revenue.

Monobazus being old, and seeing he had no long time to live, desired before his death that his sonne might come and visite him; he therefore sent for him and received him very lovingly, giving him a countrey which he called Caron, which bringeth forth great abundance of excellent Amomum. In this place was the remainder of the Ark, in which Noe was saved, during the Deluge; which remnants are to be seen at this day, if any man have a desire to behold the same. Izates remained in that place untill his fathers decease. But on the very day of his death, Helena sent for all the Lords and Governours of the Kingdome, and Capitaines of all the Army, and upon their assembly she spake unto them after this maner:

" I suppose (said she) that you are not ignorant of my husbands minde, who hath desired that Izates might be King in his stead, and hath esteemed him most worthy of such an honour: yet expect I your judgement in this point. For he that receiveth the sovereignty, not from one mans hand, but from many, and hath the same confirmed unto him by their consent, is happy. She used this discourse unto them to trie what their intent was, who were there assembled. They understanding her minde, prostrated themselves first of all upon the earth before the Queene, according to the custome of their countrey; and afterwards answered her, that they approoved the Kings election, and took pleasure to obey Izates, whom his father deservedly, and to all their contents and the desire of the common people had preferred above the rest of his brethren: alleading moreover, that they would put his brethren and kinsmen to death before his coming, to the end that he might enjoy the kingdome with all securitie: for by their deaths all the fear that might grow by their hatred and envy might be extinguished. Hereunto the Queen answered, that she gave them thanks for the favour they bare unto her and her sonne Izates: notwithstanding she required them to suspend their judgements touching the death of his brethren, untill such time as Izates himselfe should give his consent thereunto. They seeing they might not obtain the libertie to put them to death, gave counsell that they should be kept prisoners untill his coming, to the end, at leastwise for their own parts, that they might be out of danger; and that moreover, untill his coming there might one be appointed to govern the estate, whom she should esteeme most trustie and faithfull unto him. Whereunto Helena condescended, and made his elder brother Monobazus King, and set the Diademe on his head, and gave him his fathers seale ring, with that robe which they call Sampsera, exhorting him to govern the kingdome untill his brothers arrivall. Izates having certain notice of his fathers death, resorted thither speedily, and receiving his brother Monobazus willing surrender, took upon him the government of the kingdome.

During such time as Izates sojourned in the fortress of Spasinus a certain merchant, who was a Jew, called Ananias, having access to the Kings wives, taught them the maner how to serve God, according to the religion of the Jews: and Ananias by their means growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena: being drawn thereunto by his earnest entreaties, at such time as Izates resorted thither upon his fathers sending for. It chanced also in like sort that Helena was in like maner instructed by another Jew, and retained the rites and religion of the Jews.

After that Izates came into his Kingdome, and knew that his brethren and kinsfolk were imprisoned, he was much grieved. Conceiving therefore with himselfe that it would be a great

A great impietie in him to suffer them to be slain, or kept bound in prison; and that on the other side, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at libertie they should remember the evill they had endured: for this cause he sent some of them to Rome for hostages with their children unto the Emperour Claudius, and the rest unto Artabanus king of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thorowly assured that his mother was wholly addicted to the religion of the Jews, he endeavoured himself the more to shew himself zealous therein: and supposing that he could not be a perfect Jew, except he were circumcised, he prepared himself to be circumcised. Which when his mother understood, she laboured to her uttermost to hinder his resolution, certifying him that in so doing, he should bring himself in great danger; for that in being King, he would draw himself into the dislike of his subjects, if they should have notice that he was addicted to a new religion, and to strange ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that in being a Jew, he should be their King: so she for a while by her dissuasion restrained him from his desire. But the King required counsell of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the course of her dislike, threatned Izates, that if he would not obey his mother, he would forsake him, and depart from him, for that he feared, lest if the matter should be publicly known, he should suffer some punishment, as being the onely author and instructor of the king in undecent matters; that otherwise he might serve God, although he were not circumcised; since he had resolved to live according to the institution and laws of the Jews, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true religion consisteth, more then in the circumcision of the body, though he were not actually circumcised, since the necessitie and fear of his subjects over-ruled him. By which words the King for that time was wonne to affect the same no further. But some little while after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Jew called Eleazar, coming from Galilee, and accounted a man of great experience in the doctrine of our religion, perswaded him to be circumcised. For, coming one day unto him to salute him, he found him reading of the books of Moses, and said unto him; O King, contrarie to your knowledge you offend the Law, and God likewise; for it sufficeth you not, that you understand the same, but the chiefeft matter you are tyed unto, is to do that which the Law commandeth: how long therefore will you remain uncircumcised? And if as yet you have not perused the Law as touching this point, read it now, to the intent you may know what impietie it is to omit it.

After the King had heard this, he would no longer deferre his circumcision: for which cause withdrawing himselfe into another chamber, he called a surgeon unto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his mother and master Ananias unto him, he certified them what had past: whereupon they grew strangely amazed, fearing least the king should grow in danger of the losse of his Kingdome, if this action of his should come to light; for that his subjects would not endure that such a man that followed a contrary religion should be their King: they feared also, lest they themselves should be in danger, for as much as the cause of all this matter would be imputed to them. But God by his providence prevented lest any of those things which they feared should come to effect: for he delivered Izates himselfe and his children likewise out of many dangers, yeelding them his assistance in their doubtfull and desperate estates, declaring in effect that those that onely put their trust in him, and depend upon his providence, are never deprived of the fruit of their piety. But of these things we will speak hereafter.

When Helena the Kings mother perceived that the estate of the Kingdome was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and strangers, her son was reputed happy by the good will of God, she was seized with a desire to goe and visite the City of Jerusalem, and adore God in the temple, which was so much renowned thorow the whole world, and offer sacrifice of thanksgiving therein; for which cause she besought her son that he would suffer her to performe her vows: who willingly condescended to her desire, and furnished her royally with all things that were necessary for such a voyage; giving her a great masse of money with her, and bringing her onward on her way many daies journey; so that at length she arrived in Jerusalem, to the great advantage of the inhabitants of that City. For at that time the City was oppressed with a grievous famine, so as many died for want of food, for which cause Queen Helena sent her servants, some into Alexandria to buy a great quantitie of corn, the rest into Cyprus to buy dried figs, who returned with all expedition they might: whereupon Helena distributed the victuals among the poore, leaving a singular memory of her beneficence among the whole nation. Her sonne Izates also understanding of this famine, sent a great summe of money to the Governour of Jerusalem. But hereafter will will I declare what other benefits the King and Queen have bestowed upon our nation.

Now Artabanus King of Parthia, perceiving that the Princes of his Kingdome had conspired against him, resolved with himselfe to go unto Izates, for the securitie of his life and person, hoping by his means, if it were possible, to recover his Kingdome. He therefore retired thither, and brought with him about one thousand men of his kinsfolk and household servants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew very well by his royall traine, notwithstanding he were unknown unto him by countenance. Drawing therefore neer unto him, he first of all humbled himself on his knees, according to the custome of the country, and afterwards spake unto him after this maner:

„ Dread King, forsake me not, who am thy servant, neither reject thou my prayers. For being dejected by the means of my misfortunes, and of a king become a private man, I have neede of thy succour. Consider therefore the inconstancie of fortune, and think with thy selfe, that by providing for me, thou shalt provide for thy selfe. For if thou makest no reckoning of the wrong that is done unto me, divers men will grow audacious to enterprize upon other Kings.

These words pronounced he with weeping tears, and with looks lowly fixed upon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus name, and saw his humble and submissive estate, he leapt incontinently from his horse and said unto him: King, be of good courage, and let not thy present and perplexed condition dismay thee, as if thy misfortunes were irrecoverable. For this sorrow of thine shall suddenly be changed, and thou shalt finde a better friend and alie, then thou hopest for at this time. For either I wil repofesse thee of thy kingdome of Parthia, or I will loose mine own government. This said, he caused Artabanus to get up on horseback, and walked by him on foot, yeelding him this honor, as to a greater King then himself. Which when Artabanus saw, he was discontented, and fware by his honor & fortune to come, that he would set foot on ground, if he would not get up on horseback and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting upon his horse againe, he conducted him to his Palace, yeelding him all the honour that was possible, both in his sittings and banquets, as in his assemblies, not respecting his present estate or condition, but his former dignitie: considering with himself, that such casuall misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Furthermore, he wrote unto the Parthians, perswading them to receive their King Artabanus, assuring them on his faith and oath, that he would obtain a free pardon for all that which was past, and to that intent he offered himself to be an arbitrator between them. The Parthians gave him this answer, that they would not refuse to entertain him, but that they could not for that one who was called Cinnamus, was advanced in his place and dignitie, and that they feared lest a sedition should happen amongst them. Cinnamus, who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was such, wrote himself unto Artabanus, who had nourished and brought him up, exhorting him to return upon his faith, and to receive again his own Kingdome. Artabanus upon this motion gave credit to his words, and returned back again. Whereupon Cinnamus came forth and met him, and prostrating himself before his feet, called him King, and afterwards taking the diademe from off his own head, he set it upon Artabanus head, who by this means was restored to his former estate by Izates mediation, after he had been driven out of his Kingdome by his chiefest nobilitie. And he did not forget the favours which he had received at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that possibly he could imagine: For he permitted him to weare the straight Tiara, and to sleep upon a gilded bed, which is a priviledge that belongeth onely to the Kings of Parthia. He gave him also a goodly and great country which he had taken from the King of Armenia: This country was called Nisibis, where in times past the Macedons had builded the City of Antioch, by them called Mygdonia.

Presently after Izates was in this sort honoured, Artabanus died, leaving his Kingdome to his sonne Vardanes: who repaired to Izates, praying him to joyn with him in that war which he intended to wage against the Romanes: but he prevailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Romanes force and good hap, imagined that he undertook a matter beyond his power. Furthermore, he had sent five of his young sonnes to Jerusalem to learn our tongue and discipline, and his mother likewise to adore in the Temple, for which cause he the rather held back and dissuaded Vardanes from enterprizing against the Romans, whose power and puissant conquest he ordinarily reckoned up unto him, to the end he might dismay him, and by these his allegations cause him to give over his purposed intent of war against them. But the Parthian was displeased with this his perswasion, and for that cause denounced a present warre against Izates. But this his enterprize had but a fruitlesse issue: for God cut off all his hopes. For the Parthians understanding what Vardanes intent was, and how he was resolved to undertake a warre against the Romanes, slew him, and gave the kingdome to his brother Gotarza, whom not long after this, his brother Vologesus slew by treason, restoring to his two brothers by the mothers side these Provinces, that is to say, the Kingdome of Media to Pacorus who was the eldest, and Armenia to Tiridates who was the younger.

When Monobazus King Izates brother and the rest of his kinsfolk saw how happily all things succeeded to Izates, & how in respect of his piety towards God, he was honoured and revered by all men, they also resolved themselves to forsake their religion, and to serve God after the maner of the Jews. But this intent of theirs was discovered. Whereupon the chiefeft among them grew displeased; yet did they not manifest their despight, but kept it hidden in their hearts, seeking some fit occasion to revenge themselves as soon as they might. They wrote also to Abius King of Arabia, and promised him great summes of money, if he would take arms against their King, promising him that upon the first charge, they would forsake him, for that they desired to be revenged on him, who was grown in hatred of their religion. Having therefore confirmed their promise with an oath, they incited him to make haste. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth against Izates with a great power. And when as the first charge was ready to be given, and before they came to handy-strokes, all Izates souldiers forsook him, and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great disorder, as if they had been surprized with a Panick fear; yet was Izates no waies dismaied, but having discovered that it was the treason and conspiracie of his greatest Peers, he retired himself also into his campe, where he enquired of the cause that they pretended. After he knew that they had conspired with the Arabian, he caused the conspirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and slew a great number of his enemies, and constrained the rest to betake them to flight. He pursued their King also into a fort called Arsum, which he battered and assaulted with such spirit and diligence, that he took the same with a great quantitie of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but he took not Abius alive, for he himself had prevented his captivitie with his death. The Lords of Adiabena seeing themselves frustrated of their former hopes, in that by Gods hand they were delivered into the hands of their King, could not contain their displeasure, but practised further mischief: for they wrote their letters to Vologesus King of Parthia, desiring him to kill Izates, and to bestow another King upon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their King, who had abolished their religion, and had embraced a strange law. The Parthian understanding hereof, prepared himselfe for the war: and having no just colour or pretext to enforce the same, he sent a messenger unto him to redemand those honours which his father had given him; which if he refused, he denounced warre against him. Izates was not a little troubled in his minde, when he understood this message: For he thought that if he should restore the gifts, he should offer himself great prejudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for fear: knowing on the other side, that if the Parthian should recover that which he redemanded, yet would he not be in quier, he therefore commended his cause to God, trusting that he would take care of him. And building upon this, that the greatest good he might have, was to have God to help, he shut his wives and children in a strong Castle, and his corn in his strongest towers: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage; and having after this maner provided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemy. The Parthian came onward sooner then he was expected, with a great power of horsemen and footmen. For he marched forward in all haste, and encamped neer unto the flood that separateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewise encamped not farre from thence, having with him about six thousand horsemen. To whom the Parthian sent a messenger to give him to understand how great his power was, which extended from the river Euphrates as farre as Bactria, recounting unto him what Kings he had under his subjection, threatening him to punish him very severely, in that he behaved himself so ungratefully towards his benefactors, yea in such sort as the God whom he adored, might not deliver him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates answered, that he knew well that the Parthian farre exceeded him in power, but that he was farre better assured that Gods power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And having returned him this answer, he betook himself to his prayers, and prostrating himself upon the earth, and casting ashes on his head, and fasting himself, his wives and all his children, he called upon God, and prayed after this maner: O Lord Almighty, if I have not vainly submitted my self to thy protection, but have entirely chosen thee for mine onely and true God, be thou my help and assistance, and not onely deliver me from mine enemies, but also abate and controule their pride, who have not been affraid in their unbridled language, to prophane thy holy and sacred name, and utter blasphemous speeches against thy power. Thus prayed G he with sighes and tears, and God heard him: For incontinently, and the very same night, Vologesus received letters, by which he was certified that a great number of Dahans and Sarcans taking opportunitie by his absence, were entred into the kingdome of Parthia, and spoiled the whole countrey; for which cause he returned back into his countrey without any further trouble. And thus Izates by Gods providence was warranted from the Parthians threats.

Not long after this, at such time as he had lived fifty five yeers, and reigned foure and twenty, and left behinde him foure and twenty sonnes, he died, and appointed his brother Monobazus to succeed him in the kingdome, requiting hereby his faith and loyaltie, in that during the time of his absence, and after the death of his father, he had faithfully ruled and governed the kingdome to his use. His mother Helena hearing news of his death, lamented very grievously as reason would, in that she being his mother was deprived of a sonne that so zealously honoured and feared God. Yet notwithstanding she was comforted, when she understood that her eldest sonne was to succeed him in the kingdome; and hastened herself with all diligence to goe and meet him. As soon as she arrived in Adiabena, she lived not long time after her sonne Izates. Whereupon Monobazus took both her body and his brothers bones, and sent them to Jerusalem, commanding that they should be buried in three Pyramids which Helena had builded, some three stades or furlongs from Jerusalem. But hereafter will we recite the acts and gests of Monobazus during his reign.

But during Fadus government in Judaea, a certain Magician called Theudas, perswaded a great number of the people to take all their goods and substance, and to follow him to the flood Jordan; for he said he was a Prophet, and told them that the river should divide it selfe into two parts upon his commandement, and yeeld them free passage. By these words of his he deceived divers of them. But Fadus would not permit that such a fury of theirs should breed them any commoditie: but he sent a troupe of horsemen, who charged them on the sudden, and slew a great number of them; and took divers of them prisoners alive, amongst whom was Theudas, whose head was stricken off, and was afterwards carried to Jerusalem. This is that which befell the Jews under Fadus government.

AFTER Fadus, succeeded Tiberius Alexander, the sonne of that Alexander who had been Governour of Alexandria; a man of as great riches as any one of his time and place, who surpassed likewise his sonne Alexander in piety and service of God, who forsook the religion of his forefathers. In that time there hapned a great famine in Jewry, during which, Queen Helena sent huge summes of money into Egypt, and bought come and distributed the same to those that were in want, according as I have forespoken. At the same time James and Simon the sonnes of Judas of Galilee, who had busied themselves to incite the people to resist the government of the Romanes, were put to death at such time as Cyrenius valued each mans mans goods, as we have heretofore declared. These did Alexander command to be crucified. Herod King of Chalcis took away the soveraign Priesthood from Ioseph the sonne of Camydas, and transferred it to Anias the sonne of Nebodaus. After Tiberius Alexander, succeeded Cumanus. Then died Herod, who was brother to King Agrippa the Great, in the eighth yeer of Claudius Caesar. He left behinde him three sonnes; Aristobolus whom he had by his first wife: Bernicianus and Hircanus by Bernice his brothers daughter. Claudius Caesar gave the kingdome belonging to him, to Agrippa the younger. During the time that Cumanus governed, there hapned a sedition in Judaea, whereby divers Jews miscarried. The cause of all which accidents I will rip up from the originall.

CHAP. IIII.

How a great number of the Jews were slain about the Temple.

A T the time of the feast of Pascha (during which time we are accustomed to feed on unleavened bread) a great number of people assembled themselves from all parts to the Citie of Jerusalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing lest by this occasion there should arise some commotion, he gave order that a company of his souldiers should be armed, and should keep their guard in the porches of the Temple, to the end that if any trouble should happen, they might repress it. Those governours, who had been his predecessors, had done the like in such manner of assemblies. It came to passe on the fourth day of the feast, that a certain souldier discovering those privities which were undecent to be seen, shewed them before the people: wherewith they that beheld the same, were sore displeased, and provoked, saying, that the dishonour was not done unto them, but to God, to whom it rightly appertained. And some of them of best resolution cast out certain speeches against Cumanus, saying, that the souldier was set on by him. Which when Cumanus understood, he was in like manner grievously offended in regard of those injuries: yet exhorted he those, whom he saw too forward in raising factions, to keep the peace, for fear lest a sedition should grow during the time of the feast; and seeing they would in no sort obey him, but contrariwise they ceased not to injure and revile him, he commanded that all the forces he had should be in arms, and retire themselves into the forresse of Antonia that was neer unto the Temple, as we have heretofore declared. The people, seeing the armed souldiers, were affraid, and began to flie: but because the places thorow which they issued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were persued by their enemies, so that they thrust on one another in their flight, and divers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thousand men: and after this, in stead of a feast, there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themselves of their prayers and sacrifices, all of them began to weep and lament. So great a mischief sprang from the insolence of one souldier. This first lamentation was scarcely finished, before a second succeeded the same. For some of those who had a part in this mutiny, being about some hundreth stades from the City, robbed one Steven that was Cæsars servant in the high-way, and took from him all that which he had. Which when Cumanus understood, he presently sent some of his souldiers to spoile those villages, which were neere to the place where the fact was committed, & to bring the chiefest inhabitants thereof in bonds unto him. In this pillage a certain souldier found a book of the law of Moses in one of these villages, which he took and brought, and before them all tore it in pieces, with hainous blasphemies and vile speeches against the law and whole nation. The Jews understanding hereof, suddenly assembled themselves in great numbers, and ran to Cæsarea where Cumanus kept for that present, requiring him that he would revenge not their cause, but Gods, whose law was on that sort dishonoured; signifying unto him, that it was impossible for them to live, so long as their law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing lest a second mutiny and uproare should be raised among the people, by counsell of his friends cut off the souldiers head, who had committed that outrage against the law, and by this means appeased the sedition that was ready to take head.

The sedition of the Jews against the Samaritanes.

F Here hapned also an enmitie betwixt the Samaritanes and the Jews, upon this occasion. They of Galilee, who resorted to the Citie of Jerusalem at the times of our solemne feasts, were accustomed to passe thorow the countrey of the Samaritanes. And at that time it hapned, that their way lay thorow a borough called Nais, situate in a great champaine field: where a quarrell arising betwixt divers inhabitants of the place, and certain passengers, a great number of the Galileans were murdered. Which when the Magistrates of Galilee understood, they resorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute justice on those that had murdered their countymen: but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritanes, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being provoked by this contempt of his, perswaded the common people of the Jews to betake them to their weapons, and maintain their libertie, telling them that servitude is of it selfe tedious.

ous; but that when it is accompanied with outrages, it is intolerable. But their governours labored to pacifie them, promising them to deale so effectually with Cumanus, that he should take punishment of the murtherers: but they gave them no audience, but fell to arms, requir-
ring Eleazar the sonne of Dinans, to be their chieftain. This Eleazar was a thief, who for many yeers made his abode in the mountains: They therefore spoyled and burnt certain villages of the Samaritanes. After that the report of all that which had passed, came to Cumanus ears, he took a company of the souldiers of Sebaste, with foure bands of footmen, and armed the Samaritanes likewise to go and make war against the Jews; whom they took, and flew many of them, and led more of them away prisoners. When the chieftest Governours in Jerusalem saw into what an infinity of mischiefs they were false, they clothed themselves in sackcloth, and cast ashes on their heads, exhorting those that were mutinous, to forethink themselves of the ruine of ther country; the danger the Temple was in to be burned, the servitude both of themselves, their wives and children, to prophane and strange nations; and desired them to change their advice, and to lay aside their weapons, and cease to offer violence, to the end that they might hereafter live in quiet, & that every one of them would retire themselves peaceably to his own habitation. By which words in the end they being perswaded, returned home, and betook them to their businesse. The theeves also retired themselves again into their strong holds, and from that time all Judaea was replenished with thefts. The governours of Samaria resorted to Numidius Quadratus governour of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre, to accuse the Jews for that they had fired their villages, and spoiled them; telling him that their losse did not so much trouble them, as for that they saw the Romanes were contemned by the Jews: who notwithstanding ought to appear before them as their competent Judges; yet neverthelesse that they assembled themselves in such sort, as if the Romanes were not their superiours. For which cause they addressed themselves to him, to the end they might have redresse of those wrongs which they had received by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritanes charged the Jews: who answered to the contrary, alleadging that the Samaritanes themselves had been the authors of that mutiny and uproare, and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money, had smothered the matter, and done no justice on the murtherers. When Quadratus heard this, he reserved the judgement till another time, telling them that he would give sentence in the matter at such time as he came into Judaea, and had examined the truth of both sides, so that they returned without doing any thing.

Anon after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritanes had been the authors of the trouble: and on the other side, knowing that some Jews likewise intended some insurrection, he caused them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in prison. From thence he transported himselfe to Lydda, which is a borough of no lesse bignesse then a Citie: in which place he sitting on his tribunall seat, heard the Samaritanes the second time, and discovered by the report of a certain Samaritan, that one Doctus one of the principall among the Jews, and foure other his confederates induced the people to rebell against the Romanes. These did Quadratus cause to be executed: As for Ananias, who was the high Priest, and the Captain Ananus, he sent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperour Claudius of that which they had done. Moreover, he commanded the chief Governours both of the Samaritanes and Jews, that they should speedily repaire to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captain Celer should conduct them, to the end they might be judged by Cesar himselfe, upon the information taken on both sides: And fearing lest the common people of the Jews should break out into some rebellion, he repaired to the Citie of Jerusalem, to give order that the Jews should attempt to raise no new stirres: but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and busied in the celebration of the feast, and offering sacrifices to God, according to their accustomed ceremonies. Being therefore assured that no man would innovate or rebell in that place, he left them to their solemnities, and repaired to Antioch.

But the Jews that were sent to Rome with Cumanus, and the principall Samaritanes had a day assigned them by the Emperour to decide the differences that were between them: Cumanus and the Samaritanes laboured all that they might by the mediation of Cesar's friends and free-men, to have the upper hand of the Jews; and indeed the day had been theirs, if young Agrippa had not been in Rome. For he seeing that the matter was handled to the disadvantage of the Jews, besought Agrippina the Emperour wife, that she would labour her husband in such sort that he would be pleased to take full knowledge of that which was done; and that afterwards he should execute due justice on those whom he found guilty of that sedition. Claudius favourably gave ear to this request: and hearing the whole matter, he found

A found that the Samaritanes were the first authors of all those mischiefs, and caused them to be put to death who came before him to plead, and banished Cumanus: he gave order also that Captain Celer should be sent back to Jerusalem, and that there in sight of all the people he should be dragged about the City, untill he died. Furthermore, he sent Claudius Felix, Pallas brother, to govern Judaea.

In the twelfth year of his reign, he gave Agrippa Philips Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and besides that, annexed thereunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in times past appertained to Lysanias Tetrarchy, taking from this the Province of Chalcis, which he had governed for the space of 4. years. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cesar's hands, he married his sister Drusilla to Azizus King of the Emesseniens, who consented to be circumcised, because Epiphanes king Antiochus sonne would not give eare unto the marriage, for that he refused to entertain the religion of the Jews, although in times past he had promised his father no lesse. He gave Mariamme also to Archelaus Chelcias son, who by her fathers consent was beforetime promised him, on whom he begat a daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the marriage of Azizus and Drusilla was broken off, on this occasion following: At such time as Felix governed Jewry, he saw Drusilla, and was surprized with her love, for that she surpassed all other women in beauty. He therefore sent a certain Magician called Simon, who was born in Cyprus, and one of his greatest friends among the Jews, who perswaded her to forsake her first husband, and to marry with Felix, giving her to understand, that she should be happy, if she refused not this match. She unadvised, and resolved to rid her self from the envious affection which her sister Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this occasion ceased not to injure her) she condescended to forsake the religion of the Jews, and to marry with Felix, by whom she had a son who was called Agrippa. His death hereafter will I declare, and how in the Emperour Tiberius time he died, and was burned in the fire of the mountain Vesuvius with his wife. Bernice remained a widow, very long time after Herods death, who was both her uncle and her husband, and the report was that she had the company of her brother. Finally, she wrought so much, that Polemon King of Cilicia caused himselfe to bee circumcised, to the end he might espouse her, purposing by that means to make it known how falsely she had been accused. Whereunto Polemon gave eare, because she was rich. But this marriage continued not any long time. For Bernice thorow her impudency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giving over that marriage forsook also the religion of the Jews. At the same time Mariamme having refused Archelaus her husband, married with Demetrius one of the chiefest Jews that were in Alexandria, both in regard of his descent, as also his riches, who at that time also exercised the office of Alubarcha, that is to say, the Governour of Arabia. She caused the sonne she had by him to be called Agrippinus. But of all this, will I speak more exactly hereafter.

The Emperour Claudius died after he had reigned thirteen years, eight moneths, and 20. dayes. Some say, that he was poysoned by Agrippina his wife, the daughter of Germanicus Claudius brother, which was first married to Domitius Aenobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome: after whose death and long widdowhood, she was finally married to Claudius, into whose house she brought her sonne called Domitius, by his owne fathers name. Claudius had before-time put Messalina his wife to death, for the jealousie that he had of her: although he had had children by her, namely, Britannicus and Octavius. He had Octavia also by his first wife Patina, which was elder then her brethren, and was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his sonne. Agrippina, fearing lest Britannicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his father in the Empire, and desirous to make her own sonne Emperour, as it is reported: she left nothing unattempted that might bring her husband to his death; and presently sent Burrus, who was Generall of the Army, with certain other Captains, and those of greatest power among his free-men, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaime him Emperour. He being thus established in the Empire, caused Britannicus to be secretly poysoned; and not long after this he openly caused his mother to be put to death, yeelding her this recompence, not onely for that she had borne him in her wombe, but also because by her policies he had obtained the Empire. He likewise murdered Octavia his wife, and divers other noble men, under colour of some conspiracy intended against him. But I wil no further prosecute this matter, for that there are divers who have composed Nero's History, of whom some have no regard of the truth, but have spoken at their pleasure, for that he had been their benefactor: othersome transported with hatred & despoight against him, have not been ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renown, as they deserve to be condemned. Neither doe I wonder that they have invented so many lies against Nero, considering that in those Histories which they wrote as touching the precedent

Emperours, they have not studied to speak truth, although they had not any occasion to hate them; considering that they lived along time after their death. For mine own part I am intended to write nothing but the truth: neither stand I much on that which concerneth not the matter which I intreat of, purposing in all truth and diligence to declare that which hath befallen our nation of the Jews, without omitting of either their misfortunes or follies, that have proceeded with them. I will therefore return to the discovery of our affairs. Asitum King of Emesene being dead the first year of the Emperour Nero's reigne, his brother obtained the kingdome: Aristobulus the sonne of Hered King of Chalcis, had the government of the Signory of the lesser Armenia from Nero's hand. Caesar gave Agrippa a certain portion of Galilee, commanding those of Tiberias and Tarichea to live under him. Besides this, he gave him Julias situate beyond Jordan, with foureteen boroughs neere adjoyning thereunto.

BUT the affairs of Judaea grew daily worse and worse. For the countrey was replenished again with thieves, and enchanterers, who deceived the common people. Felix apprehended many of them daily, and caused them to be executed and put to death. He took Eleazar also the sonne of Dinzus, who was captain of those outlaws and thieves that ranged in the countrey, and surprized him by a subtilty. For Felix had given him his word, that he should in no sort be endangered: Whereupon he came and submitted himselfe, and was presently fettered and sent to Rome. And for that he had conceived a displeasure against Jonathan the high Priest, who had divers times admonished him to use more circumspection in the government of Judaea, for feare he should be blamed by the people, for that he had required Caesar that Felix might be admitted to the government, he thought it not amisse to cut off Jonathan, who continually solicited and vexed him. For this cause, he perswaded and bribed a certain man called Dora, who was born in Jerusalem, and was one of those in whom Jonathan reposed his most trust, to bring in certain thieves to murder Jonathan, who willingly listned to his demands; and desirous to gratifie the Governor, by this means that ensueth brought that to effect which he had intended. There were certain thieves that came up to Jerusalem, under colour to adore God, who carrying their swords closely hidden under their garments, accosted Jonathan and slew him. Now for that this murder was let slip, and not punished; from that day forward the thieves resorted boldly to solemne feasts, having their weapons hidden under their garments, and thronging in among the people, slew some of those who were their adversaries; and othersome to pleasure those, who had hired them with ready money to rid them of those they mis-liked. And these outrages committed they not onely in other parts of the City, but in the temple likewise, where they slaughtered some who little suspected that any impiety should be committed in that place. For mine own part, I think that God hath destroyed our Citie in detestation of that impiety: and for that he accounted the Temple for an impure mansion place, he hath sent us the Romanes, who have set fire on the same to purge the City, and make us slaves with our wives and children, intending thereby to teach us wisdom by our own miseries. Thus was the Citie filled with these thefts and murders. And as touching the enchanterers and deceivers, they perswaded the common people to follow them into the desert, promising them to shew them signes and miracles done by the power of God: whereunto divers gave eare, and at last suffered the penaltie of their folly. For Felix recalling them back again, punished them.

At that same time there came a certaine man from Egypt to Jerusalem, who reamed himselfe a Prophet, who incited the common people to follow him to the Mount called Oliver, situate not farre off from Jerusalem, and onely distant some five furlongs from thence, telling them from thence that he would make them see the wals of the City fall unto the ground, by which way he promised to give them entry. Which being reported to Felix, he caused his souldiers to arme themselves, and departing out of Jerusalem with great store of horse and foote, he set upon them, and slew foure hundred of them, and took two hundred alive: as for the Egyptian he escaped out of the skirmish, and no man knew what became of him. The thieves also incited the people anew to make warre against the Romanes, telling them that they ought not to yeeld them obedience; and they burned and spoiled divers of these boroughs which opposed themselves against them. It chanced also that

- A that the Jews, which inhabited Cæsarea, mutined against the Syrians that were in the same City, in that they strove to have an equall authority in the government of the State as well as they. The Jews pretended the title of superiority, because that Herod, who was a Jew, had builded the city of Cæsarea: on the other side, the Syrians avowed the Jews sayings to be true; but they replied also that Cæsarea was in times past called the tower of Straton, and that at that time there was not one Jew that inhabited the same. Which when the governors of that countrey heard, they laid hands on the authors of this sedition, as well of the one as of the other party, and gave them the bastinado, pacifying by this means the trouble for a little space. For the Jews once more being puffed up with their riches, and contemning the Syrians, injuriously reviled and provoked them: on the other side, the Syrians being weaker in substance, but as great in heart (by reason the greatest number of those that bare arms with the Romans were Cæsareans and Sebastens) at some times brake out into opprobrious speeches against the Jews, and at length the quarrell grew to that heat, that they cast stones one at another: so that on both sides divers of them were both slain and hurt, yet had the Jews the upper hand. Felix perceiving that this debate might breed a warre, came on between them, requiring the Jews to desist from further violence, and commanding his souldiers to beat down those who would refuse to obey him: by which means a great number were slain, and divers taken prisoners. Moreover, he gave his souldiers libertie to spoil, and rob divers very rich houses. The other Jews, who besides their authority were renowned for their moderation, fearing lest the like miserie should befall them, besought Felix to found a retreat, and to call in his souldiers, and to spare that which as yet remained, being foregrieved at that which had happened: to which Felix condescended. At that same time king Agrippa gave the Priesthood to Ismael, the sonne of Phabeus. There arose also a dissention betwixt the high Priests, and the other Priests and Governours of Jerusalem, and each faction walked forth accompanied with a troupe of proud and mutinous persons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of stones, so that no man might pacifie them. For all things were so out of order, as if there had been no Magistrates in the City: and the impudency and audaciousnesse of the high Priests permitted so much, that they sent their servants to the granges, to seize the tenths that were due unto the Priests; whereby it came to passe, that some poore Priests died of necessitie, and want: so much did the violence of the seditious at that time prevail above all right.

CHAP. VII.

The government of PORTIUS FESTUS: and of certain murderers.

AFTER that Portius Festus had been sent by Nero to succeed Felix in the government of Judæa, the chiefeft of those Jews that inhabited Cæsarea, repaired to Rome to accuse Felix: and without all doubt he had been punished for the injuries he had committed against the Jews, if Nero had not pardoned him upon his brother Pallas submission and intreaty; who importuned him, and was at that

- E time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chiefeft amongst the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had sometimes been Neros Master, and at that time was Secretary of Estate in the Greek tongue, by mighty bribes, to beg at Neros hand the revocation of the right and title, which the Jews enjoyed in the government and administration of the Common-weal. For which cause Berillus solicited the Emperour, and obtained a letter at his hands, which was the cause of those mischiefs that afterwards hapned in our nation. For the Jews of Cæsarea, understanding what commission the Syrians had gotten, were so much the more kindled and encouraged to make warre.

- F As soon therefore as Festus was arrived in Judæa, he found the countrey grievously afflicted with robberies, and the lower countrey was spoiled by sword and fire. The thieves likewise at that time increased wondrously, and they used short swords after the maner of a Persian Cymetre, and crooked like the Romane faulchion, with which they slew divers men. For thrusting themselves into the presse of people that came in great multitudes on the festivall dayes to celebrate Gods service, they killed those very easily whom they listed; and oftentimes repairing to their enemies villages, they spoiled and burnt the same. But Festus sent divers forces both of horse and foot against certain Jews, that were seduced by an enchanter, who had promised them security and repose from all their troubles and molestations, if so be they would follow him into the desert; who slew both the deceiver and the deceived that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a stately building, within the Palace at Jerusalem, neer unto the Porch. This Palace in times past appertained to the Asmonians, Asmonians, and was situate in a high place with a goodly prospect, from whence they that lifted, might with pleasure behold the whole City of Jerusalem, wherein the King took great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the Temple. The chiefeft men of Jerusalem seeing this building, were sore displeased. For neither doth our custome or law permit that any one should look on that which is done in the Temple, and especially forbid- deth that any man should behold the sacrifices and oblations. They therefore builded a high wall upon the gallery, which was within the Temple on the Westside, which did not onely dam up the sight of the royall chamber, but also that of the gallery without the Temple on the West side, where the Romanes kept guard neer unto the Temple on the festivall dayes. Herewith was King Agrippa sore displeased, and the Governour Festus farre more then he, who commanded them to pull down the wall. But they besought him that he would give them licence to send their Embassadors to Nero, to this intent, alleading that it was impos- sible for them to live, if any part of their Temple should be beaten down. Which being granted them, they sent ten of their chiefeft nobility, and with them Ismael the high Priest, and Chelcias the Treasurer of the Temple, unto Nero: who no sooner heard their suit, but he pardoned them, not onely for that they had done, but he commanded that the building should remain as it was. All which he did in favour of his wife Poppea, who was intreated by the Jews, for that she was a devout Princeffe, to sue for them. She therefore commanded the ten Embassadors to return, and kept Chelcias and Ismael for pledges with her. The King understanding how all things had past, gave the high Priesthood to Ioseph, surnamed Cabi, which was the sonne of Simon, who in times past had been high Priest.

The Government of ALBINUS.

JESAR being advertised of Festus death, sent Albinus to govern Judæa. But King Agrippa commanded Ioseph to lead a private life, and advanced in his stead a cer- tain man called Ananus, the sonne of Ananus, who is reported to have been most happy. For he had five sonnes, all which supplied the place of the high Priest, after himself had long time before them enjoyed the room: the like whereof hath never happened to any of our high Priests. The younger Ananus, who, as we said, was advanced to this place, was a rash and head-strong man, that followed the sect of the Sadduces; who (as we have already declared) were amongst all other the Jews the most severe in executing justice: whereas therefore Ananus was of this disposition, he thought that he had a fit occasion offered him to do what him listed after Festus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet upon his way. He therefore ascended and sat down in the Tribunal, assisted by the Judges, and caused James the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, to appear before him, with certain others, and accused them for transgressing the law, and blasphemy against God, and caused him to be stoned to death. They that were men of upright conscience within the City, and diligent observers of the Law, were very much displeased with this act, and sent secretly unto the King, beseeching him to prohibite Ananus, that hereafter he should commit no such like offence: for that his first action was not allowable. Some of them also went to meet Albinus, being on his way from Alexandria, to enform him that it was not lawfull for Ananus to assemble the Councell without his licence. Albinus perswaded by these words, wrote a cholerick letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to punish him. And for the same cause King Agrippa dispossessed him of the Priesthood, after he had held the same for the space of three moneths, and in his stead he established Jesus the sonne of Damnus. After that Albinus was arrived in Jerusalem, he employed all his care and study to pacifie the countrey, by exe- cuting divers of the theeves.

But the high Priest Ananus daily increased in honour and credit, and purchased the good will of the citizens by his liberality and great gifts. But he had certain mischievous servants about him, who conversed with those that were most intemperate and audacious, who re- pairing from grange to grange, took up many tenths that belonged to the Priests, and beat those that refused to render them. The Priests used no lesse force then did their servants, having no man that might restrain them: whereby it came to passe that the Priests, who were before-time maintained by the tenth, died at that time for want of victuals. And the theeves renewing their entrance into the City by night, during the feast that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of Captain Eleazar alive, who was Ananias sonne, who was the high Priest. And having bound him, led him out of the City, sending Ananias word, that

A that they would deliver his Secretary, if he would labour so much with Albinus, as to deliver them their ten companions then prisoners, who were taken by him. To the performance whereof, Ananias perswaded Albinus by manifest reason: and by obtaining his demand, encreased and begat a number of miseries. For the thieves used all the wily means they could devise in apprehending some one of Ananias house; and when they had taken any one of them alive, they would not deliver him, except before they might have one of their own delivered. So that encreasing both in courage and number, they waxed more and more insolent to afflict the countrey.

At that same time King Agrippa enlarged the city of Cæsarea, surnamed Philippi, and in honour of Nero called it Neronias. He builded also to his great charge a Theater in favour of the Berytians, wherein every year he spent divers thousands of silver in sports. He distributed oyl and corn to every one of the people, and garnished all the Citie with most antick and goodly counterfeited portraictures upon the porches. Briefly, he well-nigh transported into the City all the ornaments of the rest of his Kingdome; for which cause his subjects began to hate him, seeing he deprived them of their rare ornaments to adorn one strange city. Iesus the sonne of Gammaliel succeeded in the Priesthood, which the King had given him, and taken away from Iesus the sonne of Dannicus: who resigned him his place against his will. Whereupon there arose a discord between them. For having assembled their resolute followers, they grew from bitter words to fatall blowes and stones. But amongst all the rest, Ananias was the richest in wealth and by his bounty reconciled the more unto him. Castobarus also and Saul gathered each of them a band of rascals and desperate men. These two were of the blood royall, and by reason of their affinity and alliance with Agrippa, they were well beloved. For which cause they were outrageous and violent, in spoiling and ravishing the fortunes of the weaker sort. From this time forward the estate of our City grew desperate, encreasing daily more and more in wickednesse.

When Albinus understood that Gesius Florus came to succeed him, distrusts that they of Jerusalem should acknowledge some good turn at his hands, he called before him all those prisoners that were notoriously guilty of murder, and caused them to be executed. As for those that were imprisoned upon any small or slight cause, upon payment of their fines, he delivered them: and in so doing, the prison was cleansed of malefactors, and from that time the countrey remained full of thieves and robbers.

The Levites, who were ordained to sing Hymnes unto God, solicited the King to assemble the Councell, and thereby to permit them to weare the linen Robe, which the Priests were accustomed to use, telling him that such an ordinance would dignifie his estate very much, in that he would be alwaies famous in memory of this new establishment. This suit of theirs was easily respected and admitted: For the King, after he had consulted with those who were his assistants, suffered the Levites that sung the Hymnes, to lay aside their ordinary Robe, and to apparell themselves in linen, as best liked them. He permitted also that another part of the Levites, who intended the service of the Temple, should learne to sing the Hymnes and Psalmes according as they had required. All which he did contrary to the ordinances of the country, which being broken, there was naught else to be expected but punishment.

At that time was the building of the Temple finished: And the people perceiving that more then eightheene thousand workmen should be idle, and deprived of wages, whereupon they were accustomed to live in travelling in the building of the Temple: on the other side, being loath to reserve their money through the fear they had of the Romans, to provide for those workmen (in the entertainment of whom they resolved to imploy their treasure: for if any one of them travelled but one hour in the day, he was suddenly paid his wages) they requested the King that it would please him to repair the Eastern gate on the outward part of the Temple, situate in a descent, the wals whereof were in height four hundred cubits, made of square stones of white marble, from the top to the bottome, and every stone twenty foot long, and six foot thick.

This work was first builded by King Salomon, who was the first that builded our Temple. But the King, to whome Claudius Cæsar had given the commission of building the Temple, thinking with himselfe that it was very easie to break it downe, but very hard to build it up, and that to reedifie the porch, it would cost much time & expence, he denied their request, permitting them nevertheless to pave their City with broad stone. He took the Priesthood from Iesus the sonne of Gammaliel, and gave it to Matthias the son of Theophilus. In whose time the warre betwixt the Romans and Jews grew to the first head.

The Government of ALBINUS

ESAR being advertiſed of Feſtus death, ſent Albinus to govern Judæa. But King Agrippa commanded Joſeph to lead a private life, and advanced in his ſtead a cer- tain man called Ananus, the ſonne of Ananus, who is reported to have been moſt happy. For he had five ſonnes, all which ſupplied the place of the high Prieſt, after himſelf had long time before them enjoyed the room: the like whereof hath never happened to any of our high Prieſts. The younger Ananus, who, as we ſaid, was advanced to this place, was a raſh and head-ſtrong man, that followed the ſect of the Sadduces, who (as we have already declared) were amongſt all other the Jews the moſt ſevere in executing juſtice: whereas therefore Ananus was of this diſpoſition, he thought that he had a fit occaſion offered him to do what him liſted after Feſtus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet upon his way. He therefore aſcended and ſate down in the Tribonall, aſſiſted by the Judges, and cauſed James the brother of Jeſus, who was called Chriſt, to appear before him, with certain others, and accuſed them for tranſgreſſing the law, and blaſphemy againſt God, and cauſed him to be ſtoned to death. They that were men of upright conſcience within the City, and diligent obſervers of the Law, were very much diſpleaſed with this act, and ſent ſecretly unto the King, beſeeching him to prohibite Ananus, that hereafter he ſhould commit no ſuch like offence: for that his firſt action was not allowable. Some of them alſo went to meet Albinus, being on his way from Alexandria, to enſorm him that it was not lawfull for Ananus to aſſemble the Councell without his licence. Albinus perſwaded by theſe words, wrote a cholerick letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to puniſh him. And for the ſame cauſe King Agrippa diſpoſſeſſed him of the Prieſthood, after he had held the ſame for the ſpace of three moneths, and in his ſtead he eſta bliſhed Jeſus the ſonne of Damocus. After that Albinus was arrived in Jeruſalem, he employed all his care and ſtudy to pacifie the cuntry, by exe- cuting divers of the theeves.

But the high Prieſt Ananus daily increaſed in honour and credit, and purchaſed the good will of the citizens by his liberality and great gifts. The succession and number of the high priests
among the Jews.
Aaron and his progeny.
There were
89. high priests
in all.

But I think it not amisse, but very answerable to the course of this present history, to speak of the Priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number untill the end of the war. The first of them was Aaron Moses brother, after whose death his children succeeded him, and from that time forward the honour hath continued with their successors. For it is a law observed by our ancestors, that no man should be admitted to the Priesthood, except it be of Aarons posterity: for albeit he were a king, if so be that he were of another line, it was impossible for him to obtain the priesthood. All the Priests after Aaron, who (as we have said) was the first, untill Phinias, whom the seditions created Priest in the time of the warre, have been in number eightie three, wherof thirteen have executed the office from the time that Moses erected Gods Tabernacle in the Desert, untill such time as arriving in Judea, King Solomon builded a Temple to God. For in the beginning, the high Priesthood continued with the possessors for term of life: but afterwards, although the Priests were yet alive, yet were there other successors planted in their rooms. These thirteen were of Aarons posterity, and obtained this degree in succession the one after the other. Their first government was Aristocrata, which is the government of the nobility: afterwards a Monarchy, and finally, a royall government. The number of years wherein these thirteen flourished, were six hundred and twelve years, from the day that our fathers departed out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moses, untill the edification of the Temple that was builded in Jerusalem by King Solomon.

After these thirteen high Priests, there were eighteen others, who after Solomons time succeeded one after another, untill the time that Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon, having encamped before the city, took the same, and burned the Temple, and transported our Nation into Babylon, and led away the high Priest Iosedech prisoner. The time of the Priesthood, and continuance of these eighteen was four hundred sixty six years, six moneths, and ten dayes: so long as the Jews have had the royall government. After the surprizall of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, untill such time as Cyrus King of Persia dismissed the Jews, and gave them leave to return from Babylon into their own countrey, with permission to reedifie their Temple, there are seventie years: and at that time the captives being returned, Iesus the sonne of Iosedech took upon him the high Priesthood, who with those of his posteritie to the number of fifteen, have governed in a Democratic or popular estate, untill the time of Antiochus surnamed Eupator, for the space of four hundred and fourteen years. This Antiochus was the first, who with his Generall Lysias displaced Onias, surnamed Mentlau, of his Priesthood, commanding him to be slain at Beryth, and after he had driven his sonne out of the succession, he established Iacim high Priest, who notwithstanding was of Aarons race, but not of his familie. For this cause Onias, the sonne of Onias, and nephew to the deceased Onias, retyred himself into Egypt: where growing familiar with Ptolomey Philometor and Cleopatra his wife, he perswaded them to build a Temple in the confines of Heliopolis, not unlike to that of Jerusalem, and to create a high Priest in the same: of which Temple in Egypt, we have made very oftentimes mention. After that Iacim had held the Priesthood for the space of three years, he died without successor. For the City remained seven years without a high Priest. Again, the Asimoneans recovered the goverment of their nation, and after they had warred against the Macedons, they established Jonathan high Priest, who exercised the office seven years: but afterwards he was slain by an ambush, and treason conspired against him by Tryphon, as we have declared elsewhere. After him, Simon his brother undertook the Priesthood, who was not long after slain treacherously by his sonne in law at a banquet. After him succeeded his sonne Hircanus, who enjoying this dignitie for the space of thirty one years, died when he was very old, leaving behinde him Judas, surnamed Aristobulus, who dying by sicknesse, left his brother Alexander his heir, both of the kingdome and high Priesthood. After that Aristobulus had obtained the royall government, he enjoyed both dignities one whole year. For this Judas surnamed Aristobulus, was the first that set the Diadem on his head, causing himself to be called a King. The which, Alexander did continue: for he also joyned the kingdome with the high Priesthood, and reigned twenty seven years: and feeling himself draw neer to his death, he left it in Alexandras his wives hands to dispose of the Priesthood as she pleased. She therefore bestowed it on Hircanus: and as touching the kingdome, she kept it in her own hands nine years, and afterwards died. Her sonne Hircanus was high Priest for so long time: for after Alexandras death, his brother Aristobulus made warre against him: and having overcome him, he took the kingdome from him, and not only seized the Crown, but the Priesthood. After he had reigned three years, & as many moneths, Pompey repaired to Jerusalem, and took it perforce, and laying hold of Aristobulus, sent him bound unto Rome with his children. After which he restored the Priesthood once more

A more to Hircanus, committing the government of the nation unto his hands, forbidding him in the mean space to wear the Diadem. Besides the first 9. yeers, Hircanus governed twenty and foure, but Barzapharnes and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians, passed Euphrates, and made warre against Hircanus, and took him alive prisoner, and made Antigonus, Aristobulus sonne, king. But after he had governed three yeeres and three monerhs, Sossius and Herod took him alive perforce, and Ansonius sent him to Antioch where he was put to death. After that Herod was created king by the Romans, there was never any high Priest created of the posterity of the Asmoneans (for he gave the high Priesthood to certain men of obscure and base condition, who were of the order of the Priests) Aristobulus onely excepted. This Aristobulus was Hircanus nephew, who was prisoner among the Parthians; and having given him the Priesthood, he married himself with Mariamme his sister, to the intent to continue himself in the good liking of the people, in remembrance of Hircanus: but afterwards fearing, lest all of them should turn to Aristobulus side, he caused him to be slain, by finding out a means to cause him to be stifled, at such time as he bathed himself in a fish-pond neer to Jericho, as we have declared before this. After him he bestowed the Priesthood no more on any of the line of the Asmoneans. Archelaus, his sonne, followed his fathers steps in respect of the Priesthood, and from that time forward the Romanes have enjoyed the soveraigntie over Jewry. All they then that have exercised the Priesthood from Herods time, untill the day that Titus took the City and the Temple, have been in all twenty and eight. All the continuance of their government was one hundred and seven yeers. Certain of these governed during Herods life, and in the dayes of Archelaus his sonne: but after these two were dead, the government was Aristocraticall, or of the Nobility, wherein the Priests had the government over the whole nation, Thus much have we thought meet to speak at this time as touching the high Priests.

CHAP. IX.

How FLORUS, ALBINUS successor, offered many injuries to the Jews, which constrained them to take arms.

G Gessius Florus being sent by Nero to succeed Albinus, filled all Judæa with many mischiefs and miseries. He was a Clazomenian born, and was married to a certain woman called Cleopatra, no lesse mischievous then himself: who being beloved by Poppæa Neros wife, obtained this dignity for him. He behaved himself so outrageously and violently in all his government, that through the great injustice he committed, the Jews praised Albinus as if he had been their benefactor. For he concealed his mischief, taking care lest it should wholly be conceited or discovered: but Gessius Florus behaved himself in such sort as if he had been sent to make open shew and sale of his villanies, published his injustice in the eares of our nation, without omitting either rapine or injustice in execution and inflicting punishment on the innocent. For he was pitlesse and covetous, and made no difference between noble and ignoble, and was not ashamed to be partaker with cheeves: of whom there were divers that made it their profession, to steale without any feare, in that they were assured of their safety, because he was partaker with them. And in a word, there was no moderation in him; in such sort that the poore Jews being unable to endure the insolent rapines and spoiling of their goods that they received by these cheeves, were constrained to abandon their own houses, and to flie their countrey, and remained in some more commodious place of security, yea though it were among strangers. What need I speak any more? He that constrained us to raise our swords against the Romanes, was Florus who made this account, that it was better for them to die all at once in great troupes, then to perish by little and little. In brief, the war began the second yeer of the government of Florus in that Province, which was the twelfth yeer of Neros Empire. But they that desire to know exactly all that which we have been constrained both to doe and suffer, may peruse my books as touching the Warres of the Jews. For which cause in this place I will end this ancient History, after which I have begun to describe the History of the Warre.

This ancient History containeth all that which hath been reported to be done since the first creation of man, untill the twelfth yeer of Neros Empire, omitting nothing that hath befallen the Jews, as well in Ægypt as in Syria, and Palestine: All that likewise which we have been enforced to suffer under the Assyrians and Babylonians; as also our estate under the Persians and Macedons, and finally under the Romanes. All this, as I suppose, I have compiled and gathered together with carefull diligence, and I have enforced my self to recite the

the number of those, who have been high Priests for the space of two thousand yeets. I have also collected the succession of Kings, their actions & governments, with the power of their Monarchies, according as it is amply described in holy Scriptures, as also I have promised in the beginning of my History. Furthermore, I dare boldly say, that whatsoever I have set down, is so assured, that there is no man either Jew or of what nation soever, yea although he should have imployed the uttermost of his power, could more exactly communicate the same unto the Greeks, then I have done. For in their confessions and opinions who are of our nation, I have such knowledge in that which concerneth our doctrine, as I surpass them all: And as touching the Grecian disciplines, I have studied and learned the tongue, although I cannot boast of the familiar and fit pronunciation of the same, for that I have lived in the country. For amongst us we make but slender reckning of those, who are exercised in divers tongues, for that this study is accounted prophane by us, and common not onely to free persons, but also unto slaves: and they onely are esteemed to have profited in wisdom, who fully know the contents of the law, and who can expound the holy Scriptures. For this cause, although divers have travelled in this exercise of writing Histories, yet are there scarcely two or three of them that have written successfully, and have received the fruits of their labours. And it may be that it shall not be mis-thought of, if I freely speak somewhat of my progeny and life, considering that there are men at this day living, who can approve or reprove me in that I set down. And in this place I will make an end of mine ancient History, which I have reduced into twenty Books, containing sixty thousand verses. And if God grant me life, I will shortly entreat of our warres, and the events of the same that have hapned hitherto, which is the thirteenth year of Domitianus Caesar's Empire, and the fifty sixt year of mine age. Moreover, I am resolved to discover in foure Books, the divers opinions of the sects of the Jews, as touching God and his Essence, and our laws: according to which certain things are permitted us, and other some are forbidden.

Now therefore that I am not basely but nobly descended, being both on the fathers and mothers side, derived from the line of the Priests: and for as much as some are accustomed to draw the ground of their nobilitie, the one from this man, the other from that; so among our nation the marke of true nobilitie is, to derive a mans pedigree from the priesthood. Touching my self I am not onely lineally issued from the Priests, but I draw my originall from them, who amongst the foure and twentie ranks or families of Priests justly challenge the superioritie. Moreover, by my mothers side I am of the blood royall. For the heires of the Asmoneans, from whom she is descended, have for a long time exercised the priesthood and princely power among our nation. I will likewise make it knowne, how my predecessors have succeeded the one after the other. My great grandfathers father was Simon, surnamed Pfellow, that is, the stutrer, who lived at such time as Hircanus the high Priest, the first of that name, and the sonne of Simon the high Priest, was in office. This Simon Pfellow had nine sonnes: the one of these was Matthias, surnamed Apblis. This Matthias took to wife the daughter of the high Priest Jonathan, by whom he had one sonne, who was Matthias surnamed Curus, who was born in the first yeere of Hircanus priesthood. Matthias begat Joseph the ninth yeere of Alexandras government, and of Joseph came Matthias the tenth yeere of the reign of Archelaus, and Matthias begat me the first yeere of the Empire of Caius Caesar. I likewise have three sonnes, mine eldest is Hircanus, who was born in the fourth: my next, Iustus, who was born in the seventh: and Agrippa my last was born in the ninth yeere of Vespasians Empire. This genealogy of mine do I in this maner propose, according as I have found it written in the publike registers, to put them to silence who shall pretend to reprove or detract the same.

My father Matthias was not onely famous for his expresse nobilitie, but hath also bin praised by reason of his justice and authoritie in Jerusalem, which is the mother city of all the rest in our countrey. My bringing up during my tender yeeres was with Matthias, who was my brother by the same father and mother, with whom I happily profited in all kind of science, having a good memorie and a quick apprehending spirit: so that, being as yet a child of fourteene yeeres of age, I was praised by all men in regard of the good affection I bare to learning, and the Priests and noblest citizens alwaies assembled about me, to receive certaine exact instructions from me in any thing that concerned our ordinances. About the age of sixteen yeeres my desire was to have a search and insight into the sects of our nation, which (as I have said) are three: the first of the Pharisees, which is the chiefe. The second of the Sadducees. And the third of the Essenes. For I truly thought with my self, that I might easily choose the better of the three; at such time as I had been exercised and acquainted with them all: for which cause with great abstinence & no lesse labour, I passed thorow them all: and not content with this experience, after I had heard that a certaine man called Bannus lived in the desert, clothing himselfe with that which the trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but that which they willingly yeilded him, washing himselfe attentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himselfe chaste, I began to imitate his course of life: and after I had lived with him for the space of three yeeres, and satisfied my desires, at last I returned into the citie.

At the age of nineteene yeeres, I began to intermeddle with publike affairs, following the sect of the Pharisees, which very neerly resemblerth that sect among the Grecians, who are called Stoicks. After I was six and twentie yeeres old, it was my fortune to repaire to Rome upon this occasion that ensueth: During such time as Felix governed Judea, there were certein priests my familiars, men of much honor, & more vertue, who upon some slight occasion were bound and sent to Rome by his commandement, to answer to that which was objected against them in Cæsars presence. Whereupon I being desirous to labour for their libertie, having especiall intelligence, that notwithstanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulness that piety which they ought to God, but lived on figs and nuts: for this cause I departed for Rome, and was encountred with many great and grievous hazards by sea. For the ship, wherein I sailed, was wrackt in the midst of the Adriatique sea, and there were about six hundred of us that swamme all night long, and upon the day spring by Gods providence a Cyrenian ship came in sight, and both I and certain others to the number of fourescore, out-swimming the rest, were taken up into it and saved. When I had in this sort escaped, I came to Dicaarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteoli. I grew acquainted with Aliturus a Jew borne, who was a plaier, and in good reputation with Nero; by whose means insinuating my selfe into Poppeas knowledge, who was Cæsars wife, I determined to beseech her to procure those Priests liberties, with all expedition: which done, I by her means recovered their present libertie: and being gratified likewise by her with many great gifts, I returned into my country. There found I the common weale too much addicted to factions and troubles, and divers too prone and ready to rebell and forget their allegiance to the Romanes. I enforced my selfe to repress the seditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, representing before their eyes the qualitie of those, against whom they enterprized their warre, with whom they neither might compare in experience of warre, neither in good fortune: for this cause I advised them, not to hazard and overthrow their country by their rashnesse and rage, and with it their posterities and themselves.

To this effect spake I unto them, and instantly intreated them to forsake their untamed resolution, for that I foresaw that the end of this warre would redound to our utter ruine: but I prevailed nothing with them. For the fury of desperate and dissolute men prevailed above reason: for which cause fearing lest by continuall enforcing of one thing, I should grow into hatred and suspicion amongst them, as if I favoured their enemies, fearing likewise lest if they should lay hold on me, they should be put to death, seeing that the sort of Antonius was already seized upon by the seditious, I retired my selfe into the inner part of the Temple. In proceesse of time, after Manabem and the chiefeft among the theeves were put to death, I came out again from the temple, and conversed with the Priests, and chiefeft Pharisees, who were surprized with great fear. And grievously were we dismayed, when we saw the people in arms: and being uncertain what to doe, and wanting the means to pacifie these mutinies, and apparantly perceiving their manifest danger, both I and the Pharisees told them, our opinion was answerable to theirs, and counselled them to contain themselves in peace, and not to provoke the enemy. For our hope was, that Iesus would with all expedition draw our great forces, and chastise those peace-breakers. But as soon as he arrived, and had fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men were slain: whereupon grew the utter ruine of our whole nation. For such as desired the warre, were puffed up with that victory, and conceived an assured hope that in the end they should overcome the Romanes. Besides that, this ensuing occasion presented it selfe. The inhabitants of the cities that bordered upon Syria, laid hands on those Jews that dwelt amongst them, and slew both them, their wives, and children, without any just cause or crime committed by them. For they had not conspired any waies, or intended to revolt from the Romanes, or to use any hostility, or any secret conspiracie against any of those, with whom they were conversant. But among all the rest, the citizens of Scythopolis exceeded all other in impiety and wickednesse. For being besieged without by certain of the Jews, they enforced those Jews that inhabited amongst them to take armes, and charge those of their own nation (which is both prohibited and unlawfull by our laws) who fighting against them discomfited them: but after this overthrow, they in such sort falsified and forgot their faith, that they had given to their associates and fellow citizens, that they slew every mothers sonne of them, to the number of many thousands. The like misfortune also fell upon those Jews that inhabited Damasco. But of this we have more amply spoken in those our books, which we have written of the warres of the Jews: and at this present I make mention hereof, intending to signifie, and certainly perswade the Readers, that the warre which was waged with the Romanes, proceeded not of a resolute intent and purpose, but for the most part of an enforced necessity.

After that Iesus was overcome (as we have heretofore declared) the chiefeft men of Jerusalem perceiving that the theeves made a partie among the seditious, and were strongly and plentifully armed and provided, they began to fear lest if they should be found disarmed,

A they should suddenly be overthrowne by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards: and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly revolted from the Romanes, but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they sent me with two other Priests Iozar and Iudas, who were both vertuous and honorable men, to perswade the mutinous to lay by their arms, and to let them know that it was more behbovefull for the good of the nation, that such men as were in authority and reputation, should have the keeping thereof. The resolution that was taken by them was, that they had them alwaies ready upon all occasions; but that they expected untill they were certified what the Romanes intended to do.

B With this commission & such like instructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no small hazard in respect of their countrey; for that they of Galilee had resolved to forrage the same in regard of their league of friendship continued with the Romanes, and contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus Governor of Syria. But I delivered them all of that feare, and appeased the common people by permitting them, to send at all times when they pleased, their hostages to Gessius, who lay at Dora a City of Phœnicia. I found likewise that the inhabitants of Tiberias were already in armes, upon this occasion following: There were in that City three different factions, the one of the nobility, whose chieftaine was Iulius Capella, and all those that accompanied him, that is to say, Herod the son of Miriam; Herod the son of Samatius, and Compseus the sonne of Compseus (for Crispus his brother, who in times past had been governor for Agrippa surnamed the Great was amongst his possessions on the other side of Jordan) all these, I say, gave counsell at that time to subscribe to the Romanes authority, and to obey their King. But Pistus would no waies accord to this advice, in regard of his son Iustus; for naturally he was vaine-glorious. The second faction was of the common sort, who concluded upon warre. Iustus Pistus son, who was the ring-leader of the third faction, carried himselfe very doubtfully as touching the warre, yet notwithstanding he sought and thirsted after innovation, hoping that by a change he should encrease his power. Presenting himselfe therefore in the midst of the multitude he enforced himself to perswade the common sort, that their City had alwaies belonged to Galilee, and that during the daies of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the same, it was the chiefest Citie, whose pleasure it was that the Citie of Sephoris should yeeld obedience to that of Tiberias. Furthermore, he avowed that they had not lost that preeminence in the time of King Agrippa the father, but had continued the same till Felix obtained the government of Judea. But for the present wherein they had been given by Nero to the younger Agrippa, they had fallen and lost their superiority. For the Citie of Sephoris obtained the sovereignty of Galilee, after that she acknowledged the Roman government, who had abolished the table royall and publike registers. By these words and others of like nature, enforced against King Agrippa, he incited the people to rebellion, signifying unto them, that the opportunity invited them to take arms, to the end that being associated with the Galileans, they might make themselves Lords, for that all of them would willingly joyne themselves with them through the hatred they bare to the Sephorites, on whom they would revenge themselves with great force, because they continued in their allegiance, which they promised to the Romanes.

E And by these words he won the peoples hearts unto him: for he was a man that was very eloquent, and by his subtilty and politike discourse, easily overthrew all that which his adversaries produced against him. For he was not ignorant of those sciences that are knowne unto the Greeks: but trusting to his wisdom and good discourse, he began to discover how all things had past at that time, to the intent that by such colourable insinuations he might smother the truth. But in the proceſſe of our discourse, we will declare that he was a man of a dissolute life, and that by his and his brothers meanes, he wanted little of utterly overthrowing his countrey. When as therefore this Iustus had perswaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take armes, and had constrained divers men likewise, who were of the contrary opinion to doe the like, he issued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadarensians and Hippenians, that are situate in the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this estate was Tiberias: and as touching Gischala, their estate and affaires were brought to this issue: Iohn the son of Levi seeing some of the Citizens waxen proud by meanes of their revolt from the Romanes, laboured to restrain them; and required them to continue in their allegiance: but notwithstanding all his perswasion and diligence he could not contain them. For the nations round about them as the Gadarensians, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians assembled a great army, and with the same assailed Gischala, and took it by force: and after they had consumed it by fire & utterly destroyed the same, they returned every one to their dwelling full to Rome.

The danger
whereinto
Philip Tacius
sonne was fallen.

But those of Gamala persevered in their faith towards the Romanes, for the occasion that ensueth: Philip the sonne of Iacim, who governed under King Agrippa, escaping beyond all opinion, and flying to the royall Palace in Jerusalem at such time as it was besieged, fell into another great danger; to wit, to be slaine by Manahim, and those theeves that were with him: but certain Babylonians his kinsmen being at that time in Jerusalem, hindered the theeves from executing their purpose at that time. When as therefore Philip had sojourned there for the space of foure daies, on the fift he fled away, disguizing himselfe in a false haire, for fear he should be discovered: And as soon as he was arrived in one of those villages which was of his owne possession, situate neer unto the mount Gamala, he sent for certaine of his subjects to make their repair unto him. But God would not permit it; but for Philip's greater good, he crossed the scope of his intent, which otherwise had been the ruin of many:
for being surprized by a sudden fever, he committed certain letters of his written to Agrippa and Bernice who were yet but young, to one of his free-men, commanding him to deliver them to Varus, who was put in trust by the King and Queen, to administer the affaires of their kingdome, for that they were gone to Beryth to meet with Gesius. As soon therefore as he had received Philip's letters, and understood that he was escapt, he took it very hardly, for that he thought it would be said that the King and Queen had no use of him since Philip was arrived. He therefore brought him that had the carriage of these letters, into the peoples presence, objecting against him that he had forged that writing, alledging that he falsely lyed in that he reported that Philip was in Jerusalem, making warre with the Jewes against the Romans: and for that cause he commanded him to be executed. Philip being ignorant of the cause why his free-man did not returne, sent another with letters, to the intent he might discover what was become of his first messenger, and for what cause he staid so long.
But Varus accusing his second messenger also very falsely, commanded him to be executed, as he had done the first. For the Syrians that inhabit Cæsarea, had made him proud, insomuch that he aspired to high and great matters, by telling him that Agrippa should be put to death by the Romans, in regard of those faults which the Jewes had committed, and that Varus, who was royally descended, should possesse his government. For without question Varus was held to be of the blood-royall, for that he derived his pedigree from the Tetrach Sohemane that governed the countrey that abutted on Libanus. For these causes, Varus grew proud, and retained Philip's letters by him, hoping by these means that the King should have no knowledge thereof, and he set watch in every passage, for feare lest any man should sleie & certifie the king, of that which had hapned, & to give the Syrians the better content, who dwelt in Cæsarea, he put divers of those Jewes that dwelt among them to death. He intended also to undertake a warre against the Jewes of Barthana, who were called Babylonian Jewes, by confederating himself with the Trachonites of Barthana. For which cause, sending for twelve of those Jewes who were of most estimation among the inhabitants of Cæsarea, he enioyned them to repaire to Ecbatane, to signifie unto those of their nation that dwelt there, that Varus understanding that they pretended to take armes against their king, and scarcely beleaving it, had sent them unto them, to perswade them to lay by their arms.
And that this should be a certain signe, by which they might perfectly expresse that he had no reason to give credit to their reports who had enforced and objected so much against them. Furthermore, he commanded them that seventy of the chiefest of them should be chosen out, to answer to those accusations wherewith they should be charged. These twelve arriving in Ecbatane and entertained by those of their nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cause, they perswaded them to send their seventy men: which they did, little suspecting that which would happen.

dours.
The Jews re-

As soon therefore as these with the other twelve Embassadors came to Cæsarea, Varus having inkling of their coming, met them on the way with the kings forces, and slew them altogether with the foresaid Embassadors, and took his way towards the Jewes of Ecbatane. But one of the seventy, who had escaped, resorted thither with all expedition preventing Varus, and certified the rest of that which had hapned. Whereupon, they incontinently fell to arms, and with their wives & children retired themselves to the fort of Gamala, abandoning their villages which were stored with all kind of goods, and many thousand cattell. When Philip had tydings hereof, he repaired himselfe also to the fort of Gamala: where he no sooner arrived,

A arrived, but the people cried out with a loud voice, exhorting him to take the sovereignty, and to make warre against Varus and the Syrians of Cæsarea. For they had intelligence that the King was dead. But Philip moderated their fury, recounting unto them what benefits the King had bestowed on them, and of what power the Romanes were, against whom it was but a folly for them to take arms; and in the end he perswaded them to peace. The King understanding that Varus was determined to kill and murder all the Jews that were in Cæsarea, with their wives and children all in one day (who were as many in number) he sent unto him Equus Modius to supply his place, as if hath been by us declared in another place. Mean-while Philip kept the fort of Gamala, and the countrey thereabouts, persevering in their fidelitie and loyalty to the Romanes. As soon as I arrived in Galilee, and had perceived and learned all occurrences that had happened, by those who reported the same unto me, I presently signified the whole estate by my letters, to the Councell at Jerusalem, to know what their pleasure was I should do. Who gave me this answer, that I should remain where I was, and retain those Embassadors that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they being very wealthy, by means of those tithes and tithes that were given them, and very willing, because they were due, to gather them up in right of their priesthood, resolved with themselves to return to their own houses. But for that I entreated them to remain with me, untill such time, as we had settled the affairs, they willingly consented unto me. I therefore departed with them to the citie of Sephora, and came into a borough called Bethmaus distant from Tiberias some foure furlongs, and from thence I sent a messenger to the councell of Tiberias, exhorting the chieftest among the people to come and speak with me: who comming forth to visit me, accompanied with Iustus also, I told them that I was sent Embassador unto them, with those others by the communalty of Jerusalem, to perswade them to desace that building that was erected by Herod the Tetrarch, wherein in divers figures of living creatures were painted; for that our law forbade them to allow or doe such things; and I exhorted them to suffer us to doe that execution as soon as they might.

C Capella and those of his party, did for a long time refuse to consent thereunto: but in the end we enforced them so much, that they condescended. Now whilst we debated upon this conclusion, Iesus the sonne of Saphias (of whom we have spoken heretofore, declaring how he was the chieftain and conductor of the faction of failers and poore men) took with him certain Galileans, and set fire on all the palace, under hope to get great riches thereby (for that there were certain roofs of the house covered with gold) who spoiled many things against our consent. For after we had conferred with Capella, and the chieftest Tiberians, we retired our selves from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the mean time Iesus men slew all the Greeks that remained there, and who before the warre had been their enemies: Which when I was certified of, I was grievously displeased, and came down to Tiberias, and disposed of the Kings moveables, for fear lest they should be carried away by the robbers: and having recovered a candlestick of Corinthian work, princely rables, and no small quantitie of massive silver, I resolved with my self to reserve it to the Kings use. Calling therefore ten of the chieftest Senators, and Capella, Antillus sonne unto me, I delivered the vessels into their hands, charging them to deliver the same to no man, except it were to my self.

D From thence, with mine associates I went to John at Gischala, to know what his minde and resolution was, and I presently smelt out by him, that he affected innovation and tyranny. For he besought me to grant him libertie, to transport Cæsars wheat that was stored up in the villages of higher Galilee, telling me that he would bestow the same in reedifying and repairing the walls of his countrey. But I smelling out both his drift and counsels, denied him that libertie. For I thought that that wheat would either serve the Romanes, or my self, for that already I had the care of that countrey committed to my hands by the citie of Jerusalem. When as therefore he could winne nothing at my hands, he appealed to my companions, who were improvident of those troubles that were to come, and greedy of rewards, and obtained at their hands through his lavish liberality, a libertie to dispose of all the corn that was in the Province, in that I my self was unable to contradict them both. After this, John used another subtiltie: for he said that those Jews, who inhabited Cæsarea Philippi, being by the command of their King, to whom they were subject, kept prisoners within their walls, being in want of pure oyle, desired to buy the same at his hands, for fear lest contrarie to their custome, they should be compelled to use that of the Greeks. But this spake he not in respect of religion or devotion, but for his filthy lucre's sake. For knowing that among the Cæsareans, two sextaries were sold for a drachme, and that at Gischalis eighty sextaries were sold for four drachmes, he sent all that oyle that was in that place unto them, doing it (as he thought) by my permission. But I did not willingly condescend thereunto, but for fear lest if I should withstand the same, the people should stone me to death. As soon therefore as I had given him leave, Iohn gathered a great summe of money by this cunning shift.

The people of Tiberias came out to meet Joseph.

Josephs exhortations to the Tiberians.

From this place dismissed I my companions, and sent them back to Jerusalem, imploying my self wholly afterwards in preparing armour, and fortifying Cities. After this, calling the stoutest theeves before me, when as I perceived that I might not recover their weapons from them, I perswaded the multitude to hire them by rewards, telling them that it was more profitable for them to entertain them in their service, then to suffer their countrey to be spoiled by their excursions. And thus having taken their oaths, did I dismiss them under condition, that they should not come into our region, except they were called, or to receive their due pay under condition, that they should abstain from spoiling either the Romans or the inhabitants of the countrey. But above all things my care was to keep Galilee in peace. And whereas my desire was to get seventie pledges of their loyaltie, chosen out amongst their nobility under pretext of friendship, as soon as they came unto me in way of friendship, I made them my companions and fellow Judges, and decreed many things according to their opinions, having an especiall care lest through rashnesse I should injure justice, or through corruption of rewards distain mine incorrupted honour. At such time therefore as I was thirtie years old, at which yeers although a man bridle himself from unlawfull affections, yet hardly can he escape from the poisoned sting of detraction, especially if a great authority be annexed to his green yeers: I never offered vain and unlawfull courtship to any woman, neither could any man fasten bribe on me, in that I pretended want of nothing: yea, I refused those tenths which in right of priesthood I might have received from those, that brought them me. Yet after the conquest of the Syrians, I took part of the spoil, which (as I freely confesse) I sent to Jerusalem to my kinsmen. And whereas at two times I had forcibly overcome the Sephorites, the Tiberians four times, and the Gadarenians once, and had brought Iohn under my subjection, who had oftentimes sought to entrap me, neither could I endure to revenge my self on him, neither on any of the abovenamed people, as in the sequel of this Story I will make manifest.

For which cause I suppose that God, who is the tryer and searcher of all just hearts, both delivered me at this time out of the hands of mine enemies, and afterwards, and that many times out of dangerous and severall misfortunes, as hereafter shall appear in time and place. But so great was the faith and benevolence of the common people of Galilee towards me, that their cities being overthrown, and their families led into captivitie, they spent not so many tears for their own calamities, as they bestowed cares for my preservation and securitie. Which when Iohn perceived, he began to envy me, and besought me by his letters, that I would give him licence for his health sake, to bathe himself in the hot baths of Tiberias: I suspecting no treason, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreover, I wrote unto those, to whom I had committed the trust and administration of the Citie, to prepare him a lodging, and to furnish all his companions with victuals, and to provide him also of all things necessarie for his diet and entertainment. In the mean space, I my self past my time in a certain village of Galilee called Cana. But after that Iohn came to Tiberias, he wrought the townsmen in such sort, that forgetting both their faith and dutie, they revolted unto him; and many of them lent a willing eare unto his entreaties, especially such as rejoycing in innovations were too prone to change, and greedy of dissension: but in especiall Iustus and his father Pistus, willingly entertained this occasion to revolt from my obedience, and to submit themselves to Iohn; yet was this conspiracie of theirs prevented by my speedy access. For a certain messenger came unto me from Silas, whom I had in former time preferred to the government of Tiberias, who certified me of the citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haste to make my repair thither, for that otherwise the Citie would shortly fall into another mans hands. As soon therefore as I had perused Silas letters, I travelled all night long with two hundred chosen men, and sending a messenger before me, who might signify my approach to the citizens, I lost neither time nor way. And in the morning when I drew neer unto the Citie, the whole people came out to meet me, and among the rest Iohn, who after he had beheld me, and saluted me with a suspicious countenance, fearing lest his treason being discovered, he should grow in danger of his life, speedily retired himself into his lodging. And when as I drew neer the Citie within a furlong, dismissing all my guard but one, and retaining onely ten armed souldiers with me, I began to expostulate with the Tiberians from a certain high place, from whence I might be heard, and counsellled them that

A that they would not revolt, lest in so doing they might shortly repent them of their mutability and breach of faith: for that no man hereafter would give him credit, being already either suspected or guilty of this their perfidiousness.

Sarcely had I spoken this, but that I heard one of my attendants, who perswaded me to descend, telling me that this was no time now to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perswade them, but rather to seek for mine own securitie, and how I might escape mine enemies. For after that John had learned that I was destitute of followers, he sent a thousand of his chosen souldiers: commanding them to kill me, who were at hand, and ready to commit the murder, had I not speedily leapt down with my servant Isach, and being relieved by Hered the Tiberian, had been brought to the lake, where finding a barke by chance, and putting forth to sea, I escaped contrary to mine enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas.

B As soone as the inhabitants of that citie understood how perfidiously and traiterously the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were sore displeased, and betaking themselves to their weapons, perswaded me to leade them forth against them, telling me that they would revenge the injurie that was offered unto their Governour, and they blazed this treason of theirs thorow all Galilee. For which cause a number of armed Galileans came to me, requesting me that I would invade Tiberias, and entering it, that I would spoile the same; and in the ruines thereof, that I would sell the inhabitants with their whole families under the speare. The like did my friends, who escaped with me out of the Citie, perswade me. But I in no sort would admit their suite, supposing it to be a matter unworthy my discretion, to revive a cause of civill warre, imagining with my selfe, that such a contention ought to proceede no further then words: yea, I protested unto them, that such revenge would be prejudiciall to themselves also, if the Romanes standing at gaze, they should spend themselves in civill discords. By this means at length the Galileans wrath was appeased.

The Galileans

they may in-

C But when John perceived that he failed of his purpose, he began to feare: for which cause taking with him those armed men that he kept about him, and forsaking Tiberias, he repaired to Gischala, and from thence he wrote his letters unto me, excusing the fact, as if he had had been no waies guilty thereof, and besought me that I would in no sort suspect him, and confirmed his words with execrable othes, whereby he might win the more credit to his writing. But the Galileans, who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the region, knowing that he was a wicked and perfidious man, besought me that I would leade them forth against him, promising me to overthrow both him, Gischala, and all his countrey. Therefore, after I had given them thanks for their love towards me, I promised them that mine offices of love should be answerable to their kindnesse. Yet besought I them to re-D straine themselves, and to grant me pardon, for that I thought it better to appease, then procure troubles.

John excuseth

This request of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we presently came to Sephoris. But the townsmen, who were resolved to continue faithfull towards the Romane people, fearing my approach, endeavouring themselves to distract me with some other affairs, whereby they might live in more security. Whereupon, sending their messenger to Iesus, the Captain of the cheeves, that kept upon the confines of Ptolomais, they promised him a great
E summe of unoney, if with his army of eight hundred men, who lived under his command, he would wage warre with us. He, allured by their promises, bethought himselfe to assaile us suddenly and unawares: for which cause he besought me by a messenger, that I would grant him leave and libertie to come and salute me: which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his treason, taking with him a troupe of his cheeves, he hastened speedily towards me: yet failed he of his purposed treason, for when he was not far off from me, a certain fugitive of his troupe discovered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the market place, faining that I knew nothing of his secret fraud, attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among these with certain Tiberians.

Afterwards, sending abroad certain spies, who should scour the high-waies, I commanded the keepers of the gates, that they should onely suffer Iesus to enter with the foremost of his company, &c. exclude the rest: and if they should attempt to break in by force, they should bear them off. Who fulfilling that which was commanded them, Iesus entered with a few: and being willed by me presently to lay down his weapons, except he desired to be slaine, he, seeing himselfe environed with armed souldiers, obeyed. Whereupon they that followed him, and were excluded, perceiving that their Captain was apprehended, suddenly betook
F the to flight: & leading Iesus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of those treasons, which he intended against me, neither by whose provocations he attempted the same. Yet told I him that that I would pardon him, if so be by changing his manners, he would be faithfull unto me hereafter. Who promising me all that which I requested, I dismissed the man, and gave him leave to depart with his weapons: yet threatned I to punish the Sephorites, except hereafter they desisted from their treasons. About the same time there came two noblemen unto me, who were subject to the king of Trachonites, bringing with them both horsemen, armour, and money: whom when the Jews would have constrained to be circumcised, if so be they would remain amongst them, I would not permit them to be troublesome to the Trachonites, alleading that every man ought, according to his own minde, and not by other mens impulsion, serve God: and that it was not to be suffered that they, who for their securitie sake were fled unto us, should repent themselves of their trust they put in us. And thus having perswaded the multitude, I freely and abundantly furnished these men with all things necessary.

In the mean space, Agrippa sent out his forces under the conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force, which for that they durst not assault, they beset the waies, and the rather troubled Gamala. But Ebutius Decadareus, who had the government of the great champaine, hearing that I was come to a certaine village called Simonias, situate on the confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixty furlongs, took with him by night one hundred horse that attended him, and about two hundred footmen, with certain inhabitants of the Citie of Gaba their associates, whom he conducted by night, and assailed and beset the borough where I was. Against whom after I had drawn forth a valiant band of men, Ebutius laboured all that he might to rouse us into the champain, for that he trusted very much in his horsemen: but he easily perceived that we might not be won. For knowing the advantage which the horsemen had, if we should encounter them in the plain, considering that we were but footmen, I resolved to fight in the place where we were: and Ebutius charged us for while very valiantly. At length, perceiving that he had no use of his horsemen in that place, he sounded the retreat, & departed back again with lost labour to Gaba, having onely lost three men in the battell. But I presently pursued him with two thousand armed men: and when I came to Besara, which is situate on the confines of Ptolemais, distant some twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; and besetting all the passages with courts of guard, whereby we might be more secure from the excursions of our enemies, untill we had carried out the wheat, whereof there was a great quantity stored up in that place, which was gathered out of the townships thereabout, belonging to Queen Bernice, and loading divers Camels and Asses, which to that end I had brought with me, I sent the same corn into Galilee. And having finished this businesse, I offered Ebutius the battell: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldnesse, I took my course to encounter with Noepolitanus, who (as it was reported) was in the territory of the Tiberians, and foraged there. Now this Noepolitanus was a Captain of horsemen, and had undertaken to defend Scythopolis against their enemies: Having therefore driven him from doing any wrong in the countrey belonging to the Tiberians, I provided for the securitie of Galilee.

But John the son of Levi, who (as we said) lived at Gischala, after he heard that all things fell out fortunately with me, and that I was loved of my subjects, and feared by mine enemies, was sore aggrieved thereat: and supposing his own fortune was embased by my felicity, and being touched with no small envy, and in greater hope that he should hinder my good successe, if so be that he could bring me in hatred with my subjects, he solicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris to forsake me, and supposed also that the Gabarenians would revolt unto him, which Cities are the chiefeest in Galilee. For he told them, that under his conduct the common-weale should be more discreetly governed: but among the rest, the Sephorites gave least eare unto him, for that neglecting us both, they onely held for the Romans.

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to rebell: yet notwithstanding they promised him some friendship. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themselves to John, by the means of one Simon, a principall Citizen, who was Johns fellow and friend. Yet did they not openly seeme to allow him, for that they vehemently feared the Galileans, whose good will towards me they were long time assured of, but privily they sought another means to entrap me. And truly I fell into great danger upon this occasion. For when as certain Debaritenians (being audacious young men) had intelligence that Ptolomeis wife, the Kings steward, under the conduct of certain horsemen should in great pompe travell along the great Plain, out of the Kings countrey into the Romane government, they suddenly set upon them, and putting the woman to flight, thiffy spoiled all that which she carried with her. Which done, they

A they drave to Taricheas, a place where I then kept, certain Moyle's laden with apparell, and household stuffe of divers sorts: among which there were divers silver vessels, and five hundred pieces of gold. Intending therefore to reserve these things for Ptolomey, as being one of the same tribe, in that our law permitteeth not to defraud, no nor our enemies, if they be of the same tribe; I told those that brought the goods thither, that they must be kept to be sold, to the end that the price of the goods might be bestowed upon the building of the wals of Jerusalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, in that they were cut off from the part of the prey which they hoped for. For which cause, dispersing themselves in the streets of Tiberias, they spread a rumour that I would betray the countrey to the Romanes, alleading that I onely said that the prey was destined towards the repairing of the wals of Jerusalem: whereas the truth was, that I kept the same to the intent I might restore it to the owner. In which matter they were no whit deceived in their opinion.

Joseph labour-eth to restore Ptolomey to his goods.

B For after the departure of the young men, I called unto me two chiefe citizens, Dassian and Iannan, the sonnes of Levi, intire friends to the King, and commanded them, that taking the household stuffe with them, they should convey it unto the King, threatening them with death, if they revealed this secret to any man.

C But when as the rumour was spread thorow Galilee, that I would betray the region into the hands of the Romanes, and all of them being grievously bent and intent against me to punish me; they of Taricheas also giving credit to the young men, fained speeches, perswading my guard, and the rest of the souldiers, that forsaking me whilst I was asleep, they should come into the horse-race, and consult with other in that place how to degrade me, and give the honour unto another. They, being perswaded, came to the appointed place, where they found many others there arrived: and all of them cried out with one consent, that it was meet to take punishment on a traitor, who hath sought the destruction of the common-wealth. But he that most of all incited them to these troubles, was Iesus the sonne of Saphias, who at that time had the magistracy of Tiberias in his hands, a man given over to all wickednesse, and borne to breed troubles, and stirre up sedition.

Sedition
against Joseph:
Jesus the son of Saphias, conspirer
against Joseph.

This man, bearing Moses tables in his hands, and coming out into the midst of the assembly, spake thus with a loud voice: If (said he) you be touched with no care of your selves, yet at the leastwise contemne not these sacred laws, which this your chieftain Joseph, a man worthy to be hated by all men, hath of long time dared to betray, and for that cause is worthy of extreme punishment.

D After he had thus spoken, and was applauded by the acclamations of the people, he leading the armed men with him, hastily repaired to the house where I kept, with a certain intent and purpose to put me to death. Meanwhile, I suspecting nothing of all this tumult, and tired with labour and wearinesse, took my rest; when as suddenly Simon one of my guard, who at that time onely remained with me, seeing the incurfion of the people, came and awakened me: and certifying me of mine instant perill, he gave me counsell likewise, that rather, like a noble and undaunted chieftain, I should shorten mine own life, then shamefully die by mine enemies direction. Whilest he gave me this counsell, I committing my safety to Gods hands, and changing my garments, went forth into the assembly after a mournfull manner, and wearing my sword hanging about my neck, stealing by that way, by which I knew that none of mine adversaries might meet me: and coming into the horse-race, I offered my selfe to every mans eye, and lying prostrate on my face, and watering the earth with my tears, I moved all men that beheld me to compassion. And when I perceived that the affections of the people were changed, I laboured all that I might, to divide them in opinions, before the armed souldiers returned from my house: and confessing my selfe that I was not wholly cleere of that which was objected against me, I besought them to understand to what use I reserved that prey that was brought to my hand, after which, if they list they might kill me. And whilest the multitude commanded me to speak, the armed men returned back, and beholding me, rushed in upon me with an intent to murder me: but being restrained by the peoples exclamations, they moderated their fury, supposing, that after my confession of treason, and reservation of the Kings money, they might have a better occasion to finish my Tragedy.

your indignation is provoked against me. Upon these words, the Taricheans and strangers cried out, giving me thanks, and willing me to be of good courage. But the Galileans and Tiberians continued in their hatred, in so much as they grew to debate betwixt themselves, the one threatening me with punishment, the other contrariwise, willing me to assure my self of securitie. But after I had promised the Tiberians that I would reedifie their wals, and fortifie other convenient cities, they giving credit to my words, repaired every one of them to their own houses. And I beyond all expectation escaping from so great a perill, with certain of my friends, and some twenty souldiers, returned to my house.

But once again the thieves and authors of sedition, fearing lest they should be punished for these their offences, begirt my lodging with six hundred armed men, intending to consume it with fire. Of whose arrivall, as soon as I had intelligence, imagining with my selfe that it would be much dishonour for me to flie, I resolved to use valour and courage against them: for which cause commanding the gates to be shut, I required them from the top of the house, that they would send in some of them unto me, to receive that money, for which they had been drawn into this mutiny: whereby they might have no further cause to be incensed against me. Which done, laying hold of one of the most troublesome fellows, that with the rest came in unto me, I caused him to be beaten with many grievous strokes, and his hand to be cut off, and hung about his neck, and thus handled, we thrust him out of dores, to return unto those that had sent him. But they being wondrously affraid herewith, and suspecting the like punishment if they should stay there any longer, for that they suspected that I had divers armed souldiers in my house, they suddenly all of them fled away: and so by this stratageme escaped I the other danger. Yet wanted there not some, who incited the people once more against me, saying that the kings servants, who were fled unto me for refuge, ought not to live, except they submitted themselves to their laws and customes, from whom they required protection.

They likewise accused them, that they were of the Romane faction, and prisoners, and presently the people began to mutiny, being deceived by their words, who laboured to flatter them. Which when I heard of, I once more informed the people, that they ought not to persecute those who resorted unto them for rescous: and I jeasted at their folly who accused them of imppoysoning, and that the Romanes would not vainly nourish so many thousands of souldiers, if they pretended to make away their enemies with poyson. Being by these words somewhat pacified, they had scarcely withdrawn themselves awhile, but that by certain outcasts and wicked men, they were incited against the nobility, so that with armed weapons they came to the houses of the Taricheans, intending to murder them. Which when I heard, I was sore affraid, that if this wickednesse should be committed, no man hereafter should dare to trust his life in my hands. For which cause being assisted by divers others, I hastily resorted to their lodging, and shut up the gates: and cutting a trench betwixt it and the lake, I called for a bark, and entring into the same with them, I crossed over into the confines of the Hippenians: and furnishing them with money to buy them horses, for that they could not transport their own with them in that flight, I dismissed them, requiring them to digest their present misfortunes with a constant minde. For, I my selfe took it very heavily, that I was once more inforced to land those men in the enemies countrey, who had committed themselves to my trust: yet thinking, that if it should so fall out, that they should fall into the Romanes hands, they should be safer, then if by suffering them to remain in my countrey, I should see them oppress: I adventured them thus. Yet were they saved, and the king gave them pardon. And this was the end of this tumult.

But they of Tiberias wrote unto the King, requiring him to send a garrison into their countrey, and promising him to revolt and follow him. Which done, as soon as I came unto them, they required me that I would build them those wals which I had promised them: for they had already heard that Taricheas was environed with wals. Whereunto I condescended, and gathering stiffe from every place, I set the workmen to their task. But some three daies after, departing from Tiberias towards Taricheas, which was thirty stades distant from thence, by chance a troupe of Romane horsemen were discovered, not farre from the City, which made the inhabitants beleieve, that they were the Kings army: Whereupon they presently began to utter many things in honour of the King, and more in my reproach. And presently a certain friend posted unto me, and told me what their minde was, and how they intended to revolt from me. Which when I understood, I was wondrously troubled: For I had sent back my men of warre from Taricheas to their houses, for that the next day was the Sabbath: for I would by no means, that the Citizens of Taricheas should be charged or troubled

A troubled with entertaining souldiers. And at all times, when I remained in that city, I took no care of the guard of mine own person, having had often proof of the loyaltie of the inhabitants towards me. Being therefore at that time attended onely with seven souldiers, and a few of my friends, I knew not what to doe. For I thought it not fit to call back my forces, for that the day was welnigh past; and although they should have been with me the next morning, yet they might not have taken arms, because our laws forbade the same, how great soever the occasion be that is offered. And although I should have drawn forth the Taricheans and the strangers that were retired thither, and if under hope of prey I had led them forth, yet saw I that they were too feeble to resist their forces. On the other side, I already perceived that if I staid over-long, the army which was sent by the King, being already entered the citie, would have excluded me: I therefore determined to use this stratageme: I presently therefore guarded the gates of the Taricheans with most trusty friends, suffering no man to passe out of them; and assembling the chiefeft of every family, I commanded every one of them to lanch their boats into the lake, and to follow me with the masters of their ships. After which both I and my friends, and seven other souldiers, betook us to a bark, and sailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians perceived that they had no forces come from the King, and that the whole lake was covered with barks; amazed and fearing the ruine of their citie, for that they supposed the ships to be loaden with souldiers, they changed their former opinion. For which cause laying by their weapons, they themselves with their wives and children came forth to meet me, entertaining me with happy acclamations: for that they thought I had heard no inkling of their intents, beseeching that me for the safetie of their citie, I would enter the same. But I drawing neer the citie, commanded the masters of the barks to cast anchor farre off the shore, least the townesmen might perceive that the ships were empty: and I my selfe drawing neer with mine own bark unto them, accused them, for that contrary to their oaths, they had been so foolishly induced to revolt. Afterwards, I promised them assured pardon, if so be they would deliver me ten of their chiefeft nobilitie: which when they had incontinently performed, I shipt them in a bark, and sent them prisoners to Taricheas: and by this policy one after another, I at last got all the Senate of Tiberias; and many of the chiefeft Citizens, and carried them thither also.

D At length, the rest of the multitude, as soon as they perceived in how great danger they were, they besought me that I would punish the chiefe author of this conspiracy, who was called Clytus, a bold and rash young man. But I, that held it a wicked act to kill one of the same Tribe, and yet was inforced to punish him, commanded Levi, one of my guard to goe unto him and cut off his hand: who not daring for that he was alone, to enter into so huge a multitude; for feare lest his cowardise should be discovered by the Tiberians, I called Clytus unto me, and said unto him: Sith ungratefull and perfidious man, as thou art, thou deservest to lose both thy hands, I charge thee to become thine own executioner, for fear lest through thy delay thou procure thy further punishment. And whereas with many prayers he besought me to grant him one of his hands, I hardly condescended: at length of his own accord, for fear lest he should lose both, he took a knife and cut off his left hand: and thus was this tumult appeased.

Clytus the author of the sedition in Tiberias.

E As soon as I returned to Taricheas, and the Tiberians understood what stratageme I had used with them, they were all amazed, seeing how I had punished their ingratitude and disobedience without any bloodshed or murder. After I had sent for such of the people of Tiberias as were in prison, amongst whom was Isfus and his father Pisfus, I invited them to sup with me: and during the repast, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Romane army excelled all men of the world in power and force: notwithstanding that, I kept my selfe silent in the respect of those theeves that were round about, and I counselled them that they also would doe the like in expectation of some better dayes; and yet that in the mean time they would not think amisse of my government, because the time afforded them not a more affable and commodious governour. I admonished Isfus also, that before I came from Jerusalem the Galileans had cut off his brothers hands, accusing him to have forged false letters before the warre; and that after Philips departure the Gamalites, being at oddes with the Babylonians, slew Charles, Philips own kinsman, and had moderately punished his brother in law Tisus, who had married his sister. After this discourse during supper time, I dismissed Isfus and his friends early in the morning, with their freedoms. But before this came to passe, I learned that Philip the sonne of Jacimus departed from the fort of Gamala upon this occasion that ensuech: As soon as he understood that Varus was revolted from king Agrippa, and that Modius Equus who was his friend, was sent to succeed him, he certified him of his estate by his letters : which when he had received, he highly rejoyced at Philip's safetie, and sent those letters to the King and Queen, who lived at Berytum. Whereupon the King understanding the false ruinour that ranne as touching Philip, that he was the chieftain of the Jews army; who undertook the warre against the Romanes, sent certain horsemen to Philip to bring him to his presence : before whom he no sooner arrived but he embraced him very kindly, and shewed him to the Romane Captains, telling them that that was Philip, of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in rebellion against the Romanes. He therefore charged him, that taking with him certain horsemen, he should post in all diligence to the fort of * Gamala; and drawing his household servants from thence, he should leade and reestablish the Babylonians in Batanea, and travell to his uttermost power that the subject should be continued in obedience and peace. After Philip had received this commandement from the King, he hastened to performe the same.

But Ioseph a certain drougier or treacle-seller, gathering together a sort of bold young men, and inciting the nobility of Gamala, perswaded the people to fall from the King, and that betaking them to their arms, they should recover their former libertie : and thus drew they other into their opinion, killing those that durst contradict them. Amongst these died Chares and Iesus his kinsman, and the sister of Iustus the Tiberian, as we have heretofore declared. After this they requested me by letters, that I would send them aide, and certaine labourers to begirt their Town withall. To both which requests of theirs, I easily condescended. About this time the countrey of Gaulonire, as farre as the borough of Solyma, rebelled against Agrippa. I also inclosed Seleucia and Sogon, which were two strong places unaccessable, and fortified by nature, with wals. I did the like also by Jamnia Ameritha, and Charabe, a borough of higher Galilee, although they were situated amongst the rocks. I fortified in like sort Taricheas also and Tiberias, and Sephoris, cities of Galilee; and the borough of the cave of the Arbalians, Bersobe, Selamen, Jotapa, Capharath, Comosogana, Nepapha, and the mountain Itabyrium. In those places hoorded I up great store of corn, and laid up store of armour, and munition for defence.

Mean-while, Iohn the sonne of Levi, increased his hatred daily more and more towards me, being greatly aggrieved to see my fortunes happy, and the successe answerable: and whereas he was wholly resolved to rid me of my life, after he had encompassed his countrey Gischala with wals, he sendeth Simon his brother with one hundred souldiers to Jerusalem, to Simon the sonne of Gamaliel, requiring him to labour the matter in such sort with the Citie, that my authoritie might be disannulled, and that Iohn by the common consent of all, might be ordained Governour over the affairs of Galilee. This Simon was borne in Jerusalem, noble in birth, and in sect a Pharisee (which sect of all other seemed most exactly instructed in the laws of our countrey) a man of excellent wisdome, who by his counsell was able to repaire the decaying ruines of his countrey, who of long time had made use of Iohn's friendship, because he was at that time mine enemy.

This man, sollicitated by the intercession of his friends, perswaded the high Priest Ananus and Iesus the sonne of Gamala, and others of his line and faction, to cut off my increasing honours, and not to permit me to attain the fulnesse and content thereof. For it should be very profitable for them also, if I were removed from the government of Galilee. Further, he told Ananus and the rest, that they were not to delay the matter, lest upon the discovery of their counsell, I should invade the Citie with mine army. Thus spake Simon: yet Ananus the high Priest replied, that it might not easily be done, for that divers Priests and Governours of the people bare witness for me, that I behaved my selfe honestly in that government, and that it was ill done to intend an accusation against a man, who might not be touched with any misdemeanour. When Simon had heard what Ananus had said, he besought him and the rest also to speak nothing thereof, neither to make his motion known, certifying them that he had providently provided, that I should be speedily driven out of Galilee: And calling unto him his brother Iohn, he charged him to send presents to Ananus. For (said he) in so doing they would so much work with him, that they would make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time sought after. For Ananus and his adherents were corrupted with money, and accorded to cast me from the government of Galilee, without the consent or allowance of any other of the citizens. For which cause they thought good to send certain noble men in birth, and no waies inferior to one another in learning, whereof two of them were of the common sort, and Pharisees; the one called Ionathas, the other Ananias; the third was Iotarus of the tribe of Levi, who was also a Pharisee, and of the race of the Priests. But Simon was of the order of the Priests, & the youngest

A of them all. These did they command, that calling together a Councell of the Galileans, they should demand why they loved me so well; commanding them that if they answered that I was a Galilean, they should likewise say that Jerusalem was their countrey. But if they allowed me the knowledge of the law, they were likewise willed to say, that they knew their countrey customes; or if in regard of the name of Priesthood, they should say they loved me, they should likewise averre that two of them were Priests. Being thus instructed, and receiving forty thousand silver drachmes of the publike treasure, for their fellow and consort Jonathan, they set forwards.

B And for that at the very same time a certain man called Iesus of Galilee, was come to Jerusalem with a band of six hundred souldiers, they sent for him and hired him, and gave him three moneths pay, commanding him to follow Jonathan and his companions; and to doe that which they should command them: and to these annexed they three hundred Citizens; whom they hired with reward. With this preparation the Legates set forward, being accompanied with Simon Iohns brother, who had one hundred souldiers with him, who had commission from those that sent them, that if I willingly gave over arms, they should send me alive to Jerusalem: and if I resisted, by their authoritie they might lawfully kill me. They had letters also directed to Iohn, which incited him to make warre against me. Moreover, they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians, to maintain Iohn against me. After that I had intelligence hereof, by my fathers letters, who had intelligence thereof by Iesus the sonne of Gamala, one of those who were present at the deliberation, and who intirely and familiarly loved me; I was much grieved, seeing with how much ingratitude my countrey men requited me; who of malice had decreed upon my death: and for that my father invited me by most affectionate letters to draw myself homeward, telling me how much he desired to see me, who was his sonne, before he left this life; I imparted these things to my friends, and certified them, that within three daies I would forsake their countrey, and retire my selfe into mine own. Whereupon they were altogether surprized with great sadness, and besought me with weeping tears, that I would not forsake them, for that they should be utterly overthrown, if so be they were left destitute of my conduct. But whereas by no means they might perswade me, and the care of mine own security prevailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing lest I should leave them, and by that means the theeves should be encouraged to set upon them, they sent messengers thorow all Galilee, to signifie unto them the resolution of my departure. Whereupon divers of them being made privie to these news, resorted unto me from all parts, bringing with them their wives and children; not so much, as I suppose, for the sorrow they conceived at my departure, as the feare that they had of their own estates: For they perswaded themselves, that if I remained among them, there could no mischief befall them. They assembled therefore in a great Plain, called Asochim, where I remained.

E That night in my sleep I had a wonderfull dreame. For lying in my bed, and being wholly disconsolate and troubled with the news I had received, me thought that a certain man from above spake unto me after this maner: Pacifie thou the passions of thy spirit, and be thou free from all feare. For that which discomforteth thee, shall be that which shall make thee great, and happy beyond thine expectation. For not onely these things shall turn to a fortunate end or issue, but also many other. Be not thou therefore dismaied, but remember thy self that thou art reserved to make war against the Romanes. After I had this dreame, I awaked; and so prepared as I was, went I down into the Plain: and as soon as I came thither, all the people of Galilee, with their wives and children, humbling themselves upon the earth and weeping, besought me that I would not leave them for a prey to their enemies: neither that I would abandon their country to serve for a prey and mockery to their adversaries. But seeing that I made small reckoning of their prayers, they constrained me by oath to remain amongst them, and uttered divers injurious outrages against the people of Jerusalem, that envied them the peace and happinesse which they enjoyed.

F After I had heard these words, and seen the desolation of the people, my heart was broken with compassion, and I resolved my self that in respect of so great a multitude, my life could not be better hazarded then for their contentment: I therefore gave my consent to remain with them. I gave order that five thousand of the best souldiers, with their provision, should attend me: as for the rest, I set them back every one to his own house. When these five thousand presented themselves, I annexed them to the other three thousand that I had with me, and drew out with them fourescore horsemen, and marched on towards Chabalon

a borough upon the marches of Ptolemais, where I undertook to prepare them for the battell, expecting some assault from Placidus, who was come with two companies of footmen and one of horsemen, sent by Cestius Gallus to burn the country towns of Galilee, and other little boroughs that bordered on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the city of Ptolemais, I encamped mine army likewise not farre from the borough Chabalon, some fixtie stades off: and divers times drew I out my forces to bid him battell, but never would he offer any thing but skirmishes. For Placidus, perceiving my forwardnesse to fight, was abashed thereat, and retired himselfe: yet departed he not from Ptolemais.

Jonathans letter to Joseph.

About that time came Jonathan with the other Embassadors, who (as we have heretofore declared) were sent by Simon, and the high Priest Ananias, who laboured to entrap me by policy, for that they durst not assault me in open field. They therefore wrote a letter unto me to this effect: Jonathan and the Embassadors with him, who are sent by those of Jerusalem to Joseph, Greeting. We are certified by the chiefeest men of Jerusalem, that Isaiah of Gischala hath oftentimes sought to betray you: for which cause we are sent to repress his malice, and to exhort him hereafter to submit himself unto you: and being desirous to conferre with you, as touching that which concerneth the publike profit, we pray you to resort unto us as soon as you can, with some few attendants, because the borough is not able to entertain many. To this effect wrote they unto me, hoping that one of these two effects would fall out: either that I coming disarmed, should be easily surprized by them, or that bringing with me a great company, I should be condemned for an enemy to my country. The messenger that brought me this letter was a valiant young man, mounted on horseback, who had in times past borne arms for the King. The time wherein he came unto me, was two houres within night, and even then was I banquetting with my friends, and the chiefeest Governours of Galilee. After that one of my household servants had certified me, that a certain Jew on horseback came to speak with me, I commanded he should be brought in, who embracing me but coldly, and delivering me the letter, said unto me: They that are come from Jerusalem, send you this letter; give them a speedy answer: For I am commanded to make a speedy return. They that sate at the table with me, were amazed at the souldiers boldnesse. But for my self, I willed him to sit down, and to make merry with me: but he refusing the same, I kept the letter in my hand in such manner, as I had received the same, and began to talk with my friends of other affairs: and not long after rising from supper, and dismissing the rest to their rest, I onely retained with me some of my most inward friends, and commanding my page to fill me wine, I opened the letters before any man perceived the same: and concerning incontinently what they meant, I sealed them anew, and as if I had known nothing of the contents, having the letter in my hands, I gave order that the souldier should receive twentie drachmes for to bear the charges of his voyage. He having received the same, and giving me thanks, I perceived well that he was addicted to gain, and might easily be wrought with money. Whereupon I said unto him, If thou wilt drink with me, thou shalt have a drachme for every glasse thou drinkest. To this the souldier listened willingly, and having drunk good store of wine, to get him the greater store of money, he grew drunken, so that he was unable any longer to conceale his secrets: but of his own accord he declared the treason that was prepared, and how the sentence of death was given by them against me. Which when I understood, I answered them to this effect: Joseph to Jonathan, and those that accompany him, Health: I am very glad to heare that you are arrived in Galilee in good health, especially for that I may now deliver into your hands the government of the affairs thereof, to the end (according as I have long time desired) I might return into my country. I will not onely therefore visit you at Xallon: but in any further place also, notwithstanding you had never sent for me. Notwithstanding pardon me, though I come not at this present: for I am now at Chabalon to confront Placidus, who pretendeth to invade Galilee. Resort you therefore unto me, who shall read my letters. Farewell.

Josephs policy. Josephs answer to Jonathan.

Jonathans message and letter to Joseph.

After I had written this answer, and delivered it to the souldier to carry it unto them, I sent by the same way thirty of my most approved friends of Galilee, commanding them to salute them that were come, without any further speech. I assigned also to each of these one of my most resolute and best souldiers to take heed lest any of those I sent should conferre with Jonathans men. They therefore set forward on their way: and Jonathan and the other seeing their first purpose failed them, they sent me another letter after this tenour which ensueth: Jonathan and his company to Joseph, Health: We command you that within three daies, you make your appearance before us, without any of your souldiers, in the borough of Gadara, Gadara, to the end you may answer to that which John hath objected against you. As soon as they had written this, and saluted those whom I had sent, they went to Japha, which is the greatest town of Galilee, defended with strong walls, and peopled with many inhabitants. Against these the people of that Citie, their wives and children came forth, exclaiming against them with huge cries, charging them to return back, and not to deprive them of the good Governour they had. Jonathan and his companions were provoked with these cries; yet durst they not make any open shew of their displeasure, but without returning them any answer they resorted to other Cities, where they met with no lesse effectually exclaims from the multitude, protesting with a loud voice, that no man should be able to dissuade them from continuing Ioseph in authoritie in their government. Whereupon Jonathan with his followers marched forth without any further speech, and came to Sephoris, the greatest Citie of Galilee. But the inhabitants thereof being addicted to the Romanes, came forth to them: but for my part they neither praised nor blamed me. Departing from Sephoris, they came to Asochim, where the citizens sung the same song, that the Japheans did. Whereupon they being unable to contain their displeasures, commanded their souldiers to beat them with their truncheons, who exclaimed against them, and claimed me for their Governour. And when they drew neer to Gabara, John came out to meet them, accompanied with 3000. souldiers: and I having intelligence by their letters, that they were resolved to make war against me, departed from Chabalon, accompanied with 3000. souldiers; and having committed the campe to the charge of my trustiest friend, I went to Jotapata; because I would be within foure stades of them; and sent them this letter: If your will be that I must needs come unto you, there are in Galilee two hundreth and foure cities and boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you please, except Gabara or Gischala: for that the one is the place of Johns nativitie, and the other is his associates and friends.

The Embassadors of Jerusalem coldly entertained in Galilee.

Joseph writeth again to them.

The consultation of the Embassadors against Joseph.

As soon as Jonathan had received this answer, he replied not any more, but sought the means to entrap me. John was of the opinion to write unto all the cities and boroughs of Galilee, supposing that without question there were one or two in them that were mine enemies, whom they might incense against me, as against their common enemy. He gave order also, that this his resolution should be sent to Jerusalem, to the end that those of the city understanding that I was adjudged an enemy by the Galileans, might in like sort confirme that their decree by their opinion. For he said, that by this means it would come to passe, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, should forsake me for feare they had of them. This advice of Johns marvellously pleased them all, and was presently brought unto me about the third houre of the night, by one Sachau, who flying from them, came and brought me the news, & particularly related to me their intent. For which cause perceiving that the time required no longer delay, and supposing that Jacob was one of my most assured and trustiest servants, I commanded him to take two hundreth men with him, and to belay the waies between Gabara and Galilee, and to send me those whom he should surprize, that came that way; and especially those that carried letters. I sent Seremy also, who was one of my friends, to the marches of Galilee, with six hundreth men at arms, to keep the passages that way towards Jerusalem, commanding him to lay hands on all those that carried letters, and to commit the men to prison, and to send me their packets.

Joseph beseteth the waies of Galilee.

Joseph with his troops resorteth to Gabaroth.

After I had in this sort instructed those whom I sent, I willed and commanded the Galileans the next day following, to take their arms, and to furnish themselves with victuals for three daies, and to attend me at the borough of Gabaroth. Those souldiers that I had, I distributed in foure companies, and kept those with me in whom I reposed most confidence for the guard of my person: and having appointed captains over them, and commanded them to be carefull, I charged them to suffer no unknown souldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, the fifth houre of the day, where I found all the fields about the Citie full of men of warre, of those of Galilee, who resorted thither to assist me, according as I had commanded them. Thither also came there a multitude of other men from other boroughs. As soon as I came to their presence, and was ready to speak unto them, all of them began to cry out, calling me their benefactor, and maintainer of their countrey. After I had solemnly given them thanks for this favour they had shewed me, I charged them neither to offer warre, or attempt any spoile in the champaign countrey, but to encamp amidst the fields, contenting themselves with that provision they had brought with them. For I told them all in generall, that I would extinguish those troubles without effusion of blood. It hapned the same day, that Jonathan messenger and letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the passages by my appointment, and according to my direction the men were kept in securitie, as I gave order: and finding the letters that were brought me, to be full of nothing but flanders and lies written by the Embassadours; I said not a word to any man, but thought it best policy to set upon them. But *Jonathan*s souldiers having intelligence of my coming, retired both themselves and their goods, and with them John also into Jesus house, which was a great tower, nothing different from a cittadell, in which they hid a number of men of warre, and locked up all the other gates save one; expecting that I should come that way, to salute them. In a word, they had commanded their souldiers that when I should enter, they should suffer no man else to enter with me, but exclude all the rest. For they made no other account, but that by this means the might easily lay hold on me. But they were deceived of their hopes: for having notice beforehand of their intents, as soon as I came thither, entring into a lodging that was right over against theirs, I sained that I went to take my rest. Whertupon *Jonathan*s souldiers supposing that I was asleep, and that in troth I was safe; they came forth in all haste into the Plain, labouring to dissuade my souldiers from their love and allegiance, and detracting my Government. But all things fell out contrary to that they thought: for as soon as they were discovered, the Galileans gave a great shout, testifying the good will they bare unto me, who was their Governour, and they blamed the Embassadours, for that without any cause of injurie, they were come to disturbe the publike peace, willing them to be gone, for that they intended to admit no other Governour. When these things were signified unto me, I made no doubt to adventure my selfe among them: for which cause I speedily went out to heare what these Embassadours could alleadge against me. Upon my arrivall the whole troupe shouted for joy, and applauded me with a loud voice, giving me thanks for my happy and peaceable government.

Jonathan and his adherents hearing this, were afraid, lest if the Galileans should set upon them, they should grow in danger of their lives, and began to bethinke themselves how they might escape. But perceiving that they might not retire, for that I required them instantly to stay, they were altogether dismayed, and past their senses. I therefore commanded the people to surcease their shouting, and plained the souldiers of greatest trust in every passage, to prevent lest John should charge them unawares. After this, I exhorted the people to be take them to their weapons, to the end that if the enemy should suddenly assault them, they might not be driven to disorder. This done, I first of all began to rip up to *Jonathan*s followers and fellowes, what letters they had written, and how they had certified him, that they were sent by the commonalty and inhabitants of Jerusalem, to make an end of those debates that were between me and John; and how they had incited me to come unto them. Afterwards in the sequell of my discourse I produced their letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, seeing themselves convicted by their own hand-writing, and spake thus unto them:

If being accused by John, I should produce two or three witnesses that were men of reputation, to testifie for my life, it were a matter most evident that thou shouldst be compelled, O Jonathan and you my Lords Embassadours (after you had fore-inquired of their lives) to acknowledge mine innocency, and to acquit me of that whereof I am accused. But to the intent you may know that I have faithfully governed the estate of Galilee, I suppose that three witnesses are too little for an upright man, for which cause I produce all these. Enquire of them how I have lived, and whether I have governed this country in all honesty and justice. I adjure you all therefore, who are my fellows and friends of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth, but that before these men, as before your Judges you profess, if I have done any thing that is contrary to right. Whilest I spake after this manner, all of them with one accord called me their benefactor and defender, and gave testimony of my forepassed government, and exhorted me to continue the same hereafter. And all of them affirmed by a publike oath, that I had carefully prevented lest any woman should be violated, or any man by my means should be drawn into any injurie, or inconvenience. This done, I publicly read the two letters in the presence of all the Galileans, which were taken from *John*s messengers by those, who were appointed by me to beset the waies, and were by them sent to me, which were full of injuries and falsehoods, alledging that I rather behaved my selfe like a tyrant then a governour towards them: and besides that, there were diverse other things written and urged very impudently. These letters (said I) were voluntarily offered me by those that carried the same. For I was unwilling that mine adversaries should know that I had beset the waies, fearing lest they should forbear to write hereafter.

The people having heard this, were displeased and animated against Jonathan and his followers,

A lowers, and flocked on to murder them; and they had surely done it, had I not pacified the displeasure of the Galileans. As for the Embassadors that accompanied Jonathan, I told all of them that I pardoned whatsoever was past, if so be they would repent themselves of that which was done, and if upon their return into their country, they would truly report unto those who had sent them, how all things had past under my government. This said, I dismissed them, notwithstanding that I knew they would performe nothing of that which they had promised. But the whole multitude prosecuted their displeasure against them, requiring me to give them leave to punish those with all rigour, who had committed this slanderous act. But I laboured all that I might to perswade them, to lay no hands upon them, knowing full well that whatsoever mutiny it be, it cannot but breed prejudice to the common-
 B weale. This notwithstanding, the multitude would by no means be satisfied, but all of them ran in heaps with great fury to the lodging, where Jonathan and the Embassadors kept. Whereupon seeing that it was impossible to restrain their fury, I incontinently betook me to my horse, and commanded the people to follow me to Sogan a borough of the Arabians, distant from thence some twenty stades. By this stratagem I brought to passe, that the beginning of the civill warre might not be imputed to me.

The wrath and fury of the people against Jonathan and his fellow Embassadors.

Joseph pacifies the sedition without bloodshed.

After I came neer to Sogan, I assembled the people, and told them that they should not violently submit themselves to their froward displeasures, nor entertain their unquenchable desire of revenge: and I commanded them to pick out an hundred of the chiefeft and oldest men amongst them, who should make their repaire to the Citie of Jerusalem; and there complain unto the people against those that had kindled sedition in their country. And I
 C said unto them, If the people be favourable and listen to your discourse, you shall perswade them to write unto me, that according to their command I remain in Galilee; and that Jonathan and his partners depart from hence. After I had given them this charge, and that they were furnished with all things necessary for their journey, in all expedition on the third day after the general assembly, I dispatched them and sent five hundred armed men with them, I wrote also to my friends in Samaria, so to further them that they might finish their journey in all security. For Samaria was already in subjection to the Romans: and it behoved my men of necessitie, who would make a short journey, to passe that way. For from Galilee by this means a man may in three daies arrive at Jerusalem. Furthermore, I guarded the Embassadors my selfe as far as the frontiers of Galilee, laying forces and guards upon the waies,
 D to the end that no man might easily discover or know of their departure. Which done, I sojourned for a certain time at Japha.

Joseph sends one hundred Embassadors to Jerusalem.

But Jonathan and his companions having failed of their purpose intended against me, dismissed John to Gischala: as for themselves they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the same under their obeysance, for that Iesus, who was President at that time, had written unto them, and promised them to perswade the people to entertain them, and to take their part if they came: and under this hope they also retired themselves thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as mine Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his letters, requiring me to use all diligence: and I condescending thereunto, was brought in danger of my life upon this occasion that ensueth: Jonathan and his followers being come to Tiberias, perswaded divers
 E who were mine enemies, to revolt from me; but after they were certified that I was there in person, they were affraid, and came unto me, and saluting me, told me that they repured me happy, for that I had so wisely behaved my selfe in Galilee: and they rejoyced also in appearance, for that I was returned with honour, telling me that the honour that was done unto me, was their ornament, for that they were my instructors and fellow citizens, and that the friendship which I bare them, was more just then that of John: they therefore required me to repaire unto my house, promising very shortly to deliver John into my hands: and these speeches of theirs they seconded with dreadfull oathes; which made me think that I had no cause to misbeleeve them. Furthermore, they required me to take up my lodging in another place, for that on the morrow was the Sabbath day, and it were an inconvenience that the City of Tiberias should be drawn into trouble on that day. I that suspected nothing, repaired to Taricheas, leaving notwithstanding certain of my friends behinde me in Tiberias, who might curiously observe what the common talk was of me: and all along the way betwixt Taricheas and Tiberias I laid certain men in waite, who from one to another might certifie me of that which was discovered by them who remained in the Citie. The next day therefore they all assembled in the Proseucha or Oratory, which was an ample house where F in they praied, and was able to contain a great multitude. When Jonathan was entered into this place, he durst not manifestly speak unto them of a revolt, but covertly told them that their Citie had need of a better Governour. But the President Iesus without dissembling, spake plainly after this maner unto them: It were better for you (my friends) that you were subject to foure men of nobility and great wisdom, then to one: and thereupon he shewed them those who accompanied Jonathan. Hereupon Jesus arose and praised that which Jesus had proposed, and drew some of the people to his opinion. But the greater part took no pleasure therein: and there had presently followed a mutiny, had not the assembly been dismissed, by reason it was mid-day, which is the ordinary houre amongst them to take their repast in. Thus did Jonathan's comforts remit the determination of the matter untill the next day, retiring themselves without any good done. Which being presently reported unto me, I resolved with my selfe the next morning to repaire to the Citie of Tiberias: and on the morrow I arrived there in due time, for I found the people already assembled in the place of prayer, and they that were drawn to the convocation, knew not the cause why they were assembled. Jonathan's partners seeing me there in person contrary to their expectation, were very sore troubled, and bethought themselves of this subtily. They told the multitude that a certain friend of theirs had informed them, that he had discovered certain Romane horsemen upon the frontiers of that territory, some thirty stades from the Citie, in a place called Homoncea: and that the news being brought to them, those of John's faction had presently signified the same unto them, to the intent they should not endure their countrey to be sacked by the enemy. They used this speech, supposing that under pretext of rescuing the countrey, they might drive me abroad, and strengthen the City for themselves.

Now although I knew very well what their intent was, yet gave I eare unto them, lest I should drive the Tiberians into an opinion, that I was negligent and carelesse of their security: I therefore rode out, and came to the place of which they had spoken: where finding scarce a footstep or appearance of an enemy, I returned speedily without delay to Tiberias. When I came there, I found the whole councill assembled with a multitude of people, and John's partakers urging against me a very vehement accusation, that I made no account to relieve them in their warres, but that I studied nothing but mine own pleasure. And whilst they spake these words, they produced foure letters, as being written unto them by those who were upon the marches of Galilee, requiring them to come and succour them, for that the Romane horsemen and footmen would within three daies forrage and spoile their countrey: for which cause they made haste, and would not neglect their suit who besought them. The Tiberians hearing these allegations, and supposing them to be true, cried out saying, that it behoved them not in that maner to dally time, but to go and succour their countrey-men invironed with great dangers. Whereunto I answered, that I was ready to obey them, and promised to march forth against the enemy with all expedition. Now I knew well the pretence of John's partakers, and was of the opinion, that since those letters said that the Romanes gathered head in foure divers places, it was requisite to divide our power into five companies, appointing everyone of them a chieftain over them. For it is an honour for good men not onely to give counsell, but also when need requireth, to be the first and foremost in action: For I told them that it lay not in my power to lead any more then one company. This my advice was pleasing unto all the people, who presently constrained these men to march out unto the warre: whereby it came to passe, that they were greatly confused to see that they might not finish that which they had imagined, because I crossed all their enterprizes. Hereupon, one amongst them called Ananias, a wicked and perverse man, counselled the people to celebrate a solemn fast the next day in honour of God, and gave direction at the same houre that all of them should gather together in that place in arms, to protest before God that if they obtained not succours at his hands, they held all sort of resistance unprofitable. He spake this not for any piety that was in him, but to the end to surprise both me and my followers unarmed. To this advice of his was I enforced to consent, to the end it might appeare that I contemned not that which appertained to the service of God. As soon therefore as we retired every one of us to our severall lodgings, Jonathan and his partakers wrote unto John, to resort unto them early in the morning with his men of warre, and all the power he could make: for that they might easily lay hands on me, and accomplish that which they had so long time longed after. He receiving this letter, willingly obeyed. The next day I commanded two of my strongest and faithfulest soldiers to hide their short swords under their gownes, and to attend me, to the end that if in any sort we were assailed by the enemy, we might defend our selves. I put on my cures also, and girt my sword by my side in such sort, as no man might perceive the same, and came with them to the place of prayer.

But Jesus, as soon as I was entred with my friends, having the guard of the gate, would not permit the rest of my followers to enter with me: and at such time as we were ready to begin

- A begin our prayers, according to the custome of our countrey, Iesus arising, demanded of me what was become of the household stuffe that was taken out of the Kings Palace when it was burned, and where the bullion of silver was, and with whom I had left the same: of all which he therefore made mention, that he might delay the time till Iohn approach. I answered, that Capella had all, and those ten of the chiefeest nobilitie of Tiberias, and willed him to ask of them whether it were true that I spake: who confessed that they had it. What (said he) are become of those twentie pieces of gold, that you received by the sale of a certain waight of massive silver, where are they? I answered him, that I had delivered the same to the Embassadors, to defray their charges in their voyage towards Jerusalem. Hereupon Ionathans partakers said, that I had done amisse, in employing the publike treasure to the use of private Embassadors. The people being displeased herewith (for I very easly perceived the wicked disposition of these men) and seeing that a sedition was likely to arise, I thought it best to whet and animate the people the more against them: I said, that if I had done amisse in rewarding the Embassadors on the common stock, they should need to take no further displeasure for that: for said I, I will repay those twentie pieces of gold out of mine own purse. Hereupon the people were incensed the more against them, in that they manifestly discovered what hatred they wrongfully bare unto me. Whereupon Iesus fearing lest some change might arise, commanded the people to depart, and required the counsell to stay, for that it was impossible to examine matters discreetly, where so much trouble and turmoile was. The people cried out, that they would not leave me alone among them.
- C Whereupon there came one unto Iesus, who secretly informed him that Iohn with his armed men was at hand, who for that cause being unable to containe and conceale his joy, God so providing for the conservation of my life (for had their purpose taken effect, Iohn and his followers had utterly overthrowne me.) Forbear (said he) ye Tiberians, to enquire of the twentie pieces of gold: but Ioseph meriteth not punishment for this matter, but because he affecteth the tyranny, and that by his words he hath deceived the people of Galilee, and gotten the soveraigntie to himself. Whilest he spake these words, they fought suddenly to lay hands on me, intending to murder me. But those two, whom I had with me, perceiving their intent, drew their swords, threatening those who should dare attempt to offer me violence. The people likewise gathered stones to cast at Ionathans partakers, and puld me away violently from mine enemies: and for that if I should have gone but a little further, I had met wit Iohn and his army, through the feare I had, I turned another way. For crossing down a privy way that led me to the lake, I betooke me to a boat and went by water to Tarichea, avoiding this danger beyond all hope.
- D Whereupon I incontinently sent for the chiefeest men of Galilee, and told them how contrary to all law and right I had almost been murdered by Ionathan and the Tiberians. For which cause the Galileans were grievously displeased against them; and willed mee without delay to make war against them; or if I list not my selfe to suffer them with all expedition to cut off both Iohn and Ionathan, with all their followers. Yet did I restraints them the best I could, and pacified their displeasure, and prayed them to expect untill such time as wee knew what news our Embassadors would bring that were gone to Jerusalem. For I told them wee ought to execute no kind of thing without their approbation and consent: and by these meanes I perswaded them. But Iohn seeing at that time that his policy had but very slender successe, returned back againe to Gischala.
- E Some few daies after, our Embassadors, who were returned from Jerusalem, certified us that the people of Jerusalem were sore displeased with Ananias the high Priest, and Simon the sonne of Gamaliel, for that without their common consent they had sent Embassadors into Galilee, and sought to displace mee of the government there, and their displeasure was so kindled, that they were ready to set their houses on fire. They brought me also letters, by which the Governor of Jerusalem upon the instant request that the people had made unto them, confirmed me in the Government of Galilee, commanding Ionathan and his associates to returne backe againe with all expedition. After I had received these letters, I repaired to the borough of Arbela, where I assembled the Galileans: before whom I commanded the Embassadors to report how much the people of Jerusalem were displeased and discontented, in regard of those things which Ionathan had injured me in; and how they confirmed me in the government of this countrey, and had called and commanded Ionathan and his confederates backe againe to Jerusalem, to whom I speedily sent that letter that was directed to them, commanding the messenger to observe very carefully both their actions and acceptance. After they had received the letters, they were greatly troubled, and sent for Iohn and those of the councill of Tiberias, with the Governor of Gabara, and consulted with them them what they were best to doe. The Tiberians opinion was, that they should continue and maintain their estates, and that they should not forsake the Citie which had already subscribed to their authoritie, especially for that I would invade them: for that I had so threatened them, they were not ashamed to faine and imagine. This advice not onely pleased Iohn, but he furthermore gave this counsell, that some two Embassadours should be sent from them to the people of Jerusalem, to accuse mee for that I had unjustly governed the common-weale of Galilee, telling them that they might very easily incense the people against mee, both in regard of their authoritie, as also for that the common people are by nature variable and inconstant. This counsell that Iohn gave was allowed by them all: whereupon it was thought fit that Jonathan and Ananias should in person repaire to Jerusalem, and that the other two should remaine at Tiberias, and for their convoy they gave them a hundred armed souldiers.

The Tiberians intend war against Joseph. Jonathan with his followers taken and kept captive.

The Tiberians had before this provided for the securitie of their wals, and gave commandment to all the citizens to take armes, and afterwards sent for some supplies to Iohn to strengthen their garrison, if they should any waies be provoked by me. For Iohn kept at Gischala. Meane-while Jonathan travailing onwards of his journey, came to Dabaritta, a Citie situated upon the uttermost borders of Galilee in a great Plaine: and there met he about midnight with some of my troupes that kept the watch, who commanded them to lay by their armes, and kept them safely bound, as I had commanded them. Hereof Levi, who had the charge of this quarter, certified me by his letters: wherefore dissembling the matter for some two daies, I sent letters to the Tiberians, by which I counselled them, that laying their armes aside, they should dismisfe every one to his own dwelling place. But they returned me an injurious answer: for they supposed that Jonathan and his traine were already arrived in Jerusalem. But I setting light by their injuries, resolved to circumvent them by this cunning stratagem: For I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle warre against the citizens. Being therefore very willing to draw them out of their wals, I chose out ten thousand of my best souldiers, whom I distributed into three bands, and lodged one company of them secretly at Dora, to lie there in ambush: I encamped also another thousand in a certaine borough situate in a mountainous place, some foure stades distant from Tiberias; commanding them that as soon as I gave them a watchword or signe, they should break forth: as for my self, I withdrew my self and kept in the open field, and fate me down on the grasse. Which when the Tiberians perceived, they made continuall excursions towards me, using many bitter and injurious taunts against me: and so great folly possessed them, that they spread a magnificent couch in the open Plaine; and marching round about the same, they scornfully seemed to lament me, as if I had lien therein, whilest in the meane time I took pleasure to laugh and looke upon their follies.

The Tiberians scoffe very bitterly against Joseph.

But being very desirous to surprize Simon by some policie, and Isazar also with him, I sent unto them, requiring them that they would march forth a little without their wals, attended by their friends and guard for their securitie sake; for that I was determined to confesse with them upon a peace, and to confirme the one half of the government unto them. Hereupon Simon deceived by his folly, and overcome and blinded with greedy desire, came forth with all expedition: but Isazar suspecting some stratagem, would not adventure without the wals. As soone as I saw Simon attended by his friends and guard, I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giving him thanks for that he was come down; anon after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate somewhat with him in secret, I withdrew him from his friends, and laying hands on him, I delivered him to my friends to lead him into the borough, and gave a signe unto my souldiers that they should come down, and with them I assaulted the Citie of Tiberias. There was a sharpe skirmish on both sides, and the Tiberians had welnigh gotten the victory: For my souldiers began to flie; but perceiving how the matter went, I animated those of my company, and with them gave a valiant onset on the Tiberians, who almost had the better, and chased them into their Citie, and sent another company by the lake, to set on fire those houses which they should first fall upon. Hereupon the Tiberians thought that their citie was taken by force, and cast down their weapons for fear, praying me to have compassion of their wives and children, and to pardon their citie. For this cause being moved with compassion, I restrained the furie of my souldiers; and for that it was late, I retired my self with my souldiers, both to the intent I might spare the citie, and relieve my wearied and wounded souldiers. Hereupon I sent for Simon to come and banquet with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promising him to send him to Jerusalem, and to assure him in his journey homeward, and to furnish him for his ordinarie expences with all things necessarie. The next day I assembled ten thousand souldiers,

A souldiers, and presently made mine entry into Tiberias; and having assembled the chiefeft citizens in the horse-race, I commanded them to discover unto me who they were that were the authors of that rebellion: who having satisfied me, I laid hands on them and bound them, and sent them incontinently to Jotapata. As for Jonathan and his consorts, I set them at liberty, and gave them money for their charges, and sent them back to Jerusalem with Simon and Isazar, and five hundred souldiers for their guard. Hereupon the Tiberians reassembled themselves before me, beseeching me to pardon their misdeeds, promising me to recompence by their future fidelity their forepassed and foul faults: beseeching me also to restore those goods unto the citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gave a present command, that all the prey should be brought and laid before me: and whereas the souldiers delaied to perform the same, I spying one of those souldiers that stood by me, better apparelled then he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that garment: who confessing that he had taken it in the spoil of the citie, I chastised him with strokes, and threatned a worse punishment to all those that would not restore that which they had taken away: whereby recovering a great part of the prey together, I gave every citizen that which he knew to be his own.

Joseph sends the authors of the sedition to Jotapata.

Those goods that were taken from the citizens are restored.

In this place I cannot chuse but in some sort I must reprehend Iustus, who wrote upon this argument, and others, who promising a History, are not afraid in contempt of truth, either for favour or hatred, to commit lies to their posterity. For they differ nothing from counterfeits of evidences, and razers of records, but that these men are more corrupted by impunity. For he, to the end he might seem to imploy his time well, undertaking to set down the events of this warre, hath belied me in many things, and hath not been ashamed to belie his own countrey. For which cause I am necessarily inforced in this place to discover that which hitherto I have concealed, and to reprove that which he hath falsely testified of me: neither is it to be wondred at, that I have so long time deferred the performance thereof. For whosoever writeth a History, ought of necessity to speak the truth; yet is it not lawfull for him to inveigh against the wickedest sort too vehemently; not for that they are worthy of this favour, but for his own modesties sake.

A reproof of Iustus the Historiographer, that falsely accused Joseph.

Tell me therefore Iustus (for thou desirest to be held for the man of greatest note amongst all other Historians, and art not ashamed to vaunt and boast thy selfe of that title) tell mee I pray thee in familiarity (for I must so talk with thee as if thou wert present before me) how I and the Galileans have been the authors of that rebellion, which thy countrey began both against the Romans and their King. For before I was chosen governor of Galilee by the people of Jerusalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not onely up in armes, but had already made warre against the ten Cities of Syria. Thy selfe hadst burnt their villages, and one of thy servants died in that encounter: yet not I alone protest this, but it is extant also in writing in the records of the Emperour Vespasian, how the inhabitants of these ten cities cried out to Vespasian in the city of Ptolemais, requiring that thou mightest be punished, as the author of their mischiefs: and assuredly thou hadst been punished by the Emperour, had not Agrippa, who had received commission to execute thee, upon the instant request of his sister Bernice spared thy life, and kept thee bound in prison for a long time. Furthermore, thy politike behaviours do sufficiently expresse what the rest of thy life hath been, and how thou hast caused thy countrey to rebell against the Romans: whereof I will produce hereafter most evident arguments, and for thy cause will I urge some what against those other Tiberians; and I will make it plaine to those that shall read these Histories, that thou hast been no friend to Rome, nor faithfull to thy King. And I enforce these my authorities from the greatest cities of Galilee, Sephoris, and Tiberias, in which thou Iustus wert born. For Sephoris is situate in the heart of Galilee, having round about it a number of villages, and being a city sufficiently able in it self to attempt and execute any noble action at their pleasure, yet notwithstanding the citizens thereof resolved to observe their faith to the Romans, and thrust me out of doores, forbidding every man among them to bear arms for the Jewes. And to the end they might be more assured in my behalf, the inhabitants deceived me, in that they entreated me to encompassse their citie with a wall: and that done, they willingly entertained a Garrison which was sent them from Cestius Gallus, who was generall of the Roman Legions in Syria in contempt of me, although at that time I had a great power, and terrified the countrey round abouts. But when our great city of Jerusalem was besieged, and that Temple which was common to all our Nation, was in danger to fall into the enemies hands, the Sephorites sent no succours, to the end it might not be said that they took arms against the Romans: But thy countrey, Iustus, being situate upon the lake of Genazareth distant from

from Hippus thirty stades, from Gadara sixty, from Scythopolis sixscore, in a countrey obedient to the King, having not any city of the Jews round about it, might have very easily kept their faith to the Romanes, if they had listd. For both the city and people were furnished with munition in all abundance: But as thou sayest, I was the cause at that time. And who afterwards? For thou knowest that before the siege of Jerusalem, I was in the Romanes hands, and that Jotapata was taken by force, and divers other castles, and that many other Galileans were spent in divers battels. At that time shouldest thou have delivered thy self of that fear thou hadst of me, laying thine arms aside, and presenting thy self to the King and the Romanes, when thou undertookst arms not of thine own accord, but inforced. But the truth is, you expected Vespasians coming, even untill such time as he begirt your city with a siege, and then laid you your arms aside for fear of danger: yea even then had your city been overthrown, except the King in excuse of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Vespasians hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your offence, that behaved yourselves like enemies. Do you not remember how often times I have obtained the victory against you, and how few times you could complain of blood-shed? But you falling at dissention one with another, have been the instruments of your own ruin, and not for the love you bare either to the King, or the Romanes, but of your own malice slew an hundred eighty five citizens, at such time as I was besieged by the Romanes in Jotapata. Nay more, is not this true, that during the siege of Jerusalem, whereof I have made mention, there were more then two thousand Tiberians slain, or otherwise taken prisoners? But perhaps thou wilt alleadge, that at that time thou wert no enemy, for that thou wert fled to the King, but I tell thee that thou fleddest thither for the fear thou hadst of me. I am a wicked man, as thou sayest: but what art thou? whom King Agrippa, upon many presents delivered from punishment, at such time as thou wert condemned by Vespasian to lose thy head. For what cause having made thee prisoner twice, and having so many times past the sentence of banishment against thee, and having once commanded thee to be thine own murtherer, hath he given life upon the importunate sollicitation of his sister Bernice? And after so many crimes committed by thee, having entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he banished thee from his presence.

But I will not too exactly touch thee with these matters, yet not withstanding I wonder at thine impudence, that hast openly protested, that thou hast written more exactly and perfectly of this matter, then any man: whereas thou art utterly ignorant of those things that were done in Galilee. For at that time wert thou at Berytum with the King, & wert no waies privy to the siege of Jotapata, seeing thou didst not follow us. Neither couldst thou be able to learn how I behaved my self therein, for that there was no one left alive to give thee certain intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps say, that thou hast carefully discribed that, which hapned during the siege of Jerusalem. And how may this be possible? For thou wert neither agent nor looker on in that warre, neither hast thou read the commentaries of Vespasian. But I conjecture hereby that thou hast not read them at all, forasmuch as thou hast written clean contrary to that which is contained therein. And if thou art so confident, that thy History is truer then other mens, why didst thou not publish it during Vespasians and Titus lives, who were the Generals of that warre, neither before King Agrippa and those of his race, who were all of them very expert in the Greek tongue? For thou hast kept it written by thee above twenty yeers, and mightest have produced witnesse of thine exact diligence before them, who were privy to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkest that no man liveth that may reprove thee, thou hast undertaken this boldnesse to publish thy work. But I have used no such policy or feare in my books, but have presented them to the Emperors themselves, who have been eye-witnesses and actors thereof. For I knew in mine own soule that I had set downe all things truly: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreover, I communicated the same History with divers others, whereof some of them were present in the warre, as was King Agrippa, and some of his kindred. And Titus the Emperour himselfe was so desirous that men should search for the truth of that History out of these books, that he placed them in a Library, and caused them to be published, being subscribed with his own hand. As for King Agrippa, he sent me seventy two Epistles, testifying the truth of my books, whereof two of them are under written, to the end that the truth may appear thereby. King Agrippa to his dear friend Joseph, Health: I have with great contentment over read thy book, wherein thou seemest in my opinion to have handled this matter more exactly, then any other. For which cause I pray thee send me the rest. Farewell my dear friend. King Agrippa to Joseph his dear friend, Health: I perceive by my own writing, that thou needest no intelligence from me, how matters have passed from the beginning: yet when

A when we meet next, I will between me and thee certify thee of certain things which thou knowest not. Thus was he a witness of the truth of my accomplished History: not flattering me, for it became him not; neither deriding me, as you perhaps may object: for farre was it from so noble a minde to be subject to so servile a folly: but only to this end, that the truth of my writings might be commended to the reader by the worth of his testimony. And thus much have I thought good to set down in way of answer to Ischy.

Josephus prosecuteth his History, and leaveth to debate with Justus.

Now as soon as I had pacified these troubles in Tiberias, and had established a councill of such as were well affected towards me, I bethought my self of that which concerned me to do in respect of John. All they of Galilee were of the opinion, that I should arme them all, and th in battell army I should march against John, and do justice upon him, as he that had been the author of all this mischief. But for mine own part, I disliked their counsels; for that my desire was to extinguish these troubles without blood-shed, and for that cause I incired them with all diligence that was possible, to learn the names of all those who served under him: which being done, and I made privy what they were, I published a proclamation, by which I promised both safety and pardon to all those, that would forsake John, assigning them the terme of twenty daies, to determine of that which seemed best for their own securitie: and I threatened to set fire on their houses, and confiscate their goods, except they gave over their arms. They hearing these things, were greatly troubled, and forsook John: and after they had laid down their weapons, they came unto me to the number of four thousand: so that onely fifteen hundred men remained with John or thereabouts, either of Ciizens, or strangers of Tyre. When John perceived that he was circumvented by this policy, he ever after remained quiet in his countrey in great fear.

Four thousand of John follow him, & follow Joseph.

At that time the Sephorites grew so bold, that they took arms under the confidence and strength of their wals, and for that they saw me distracted with other business. They therefore sent to Cestius Gallus Governour of Syria, praying him to repair unto them, with all expedition, to take possession of their Citie, or to send them a Garrison of men at the least. Gallus promised to come unto them, but he set down no certain time of his approach: whereof when I was advertised, I took the men of war that I had, and marched against the Sephorites, and took their citie by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunitie, and supposing the time was come wherein they might satisfie the insatiable hatred that they bare against that Citie, marched on with that intent, as if they would have wholly ruined the Citie, with all the inhabitants. They therefore traversed the streets, and set fire on the houses, which they found wholly desolate: For the inhabitants were fled away for fear, and were retired into a fortress. They therefore sackt all things, and left nothing unspoiled: neither was there any kinde of miserie which they inflicted not on their countrymen. Which when I saw, I was foregrieved, and commanded them to give over, signifying unto them that it was impiorie in them, to shew themselves so savage towards their countrymen. And seeing that neither by any prayer or command that I made, I could draw them to obedience, for that their hatred surpassed my counsels, I commanded those that were about me, and whom I most trusted, to spread a rumour that the Romanes charged us on the other side of the Citie, with great force. All which I did, to the end that by this rumour I might pacifie the fury of the Galileans, and save the Citie of Sephoris: and this policie took good effect. For when they heard this news, they were afraid, and forsook their pillage, to trust to their heels, in especiall for that I who was their Generall did the like. For I made a shew, that I beleevd the rumour to be as true, as they beleevd it: and by this stratagem the Citie Sephoris was saved beyond all hope.

Sephoris spoiled.

And hardly escaped Tiberias from being spoiled by the Galileans, through this occasion which ensueth: The chieft of their councill wrote unto the King, that he should come unto them, and take possession of their Citie. The king promised to satisfie them very shortly, and answered them by his letters, and delivered them to one of his chamber, called Crispus a Jew born, to carry them to the Tiberians. The Galileans knowing this messenger, took him and brought him unto me: which when the common people understood, of meer spleen they fell to arms, and the next day divers of them assembled themselves from all parts, and came to the Citie of Asoch where I made my abode, and made huge exclamations, calling the Tiberians traitors, and the kings friends, and demanding of mee licence and libertie that they might repair to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much displeased against the Tiberians, as they were against the Sephorites.

Tiberias in danger of ruin.

Which when I heard, I stood in great doubt how I might deliver the Tiberians from that displeasure, which the Galileans had conceived against them: for I could not deny but that the

the Tiberians had written and sent for the King: for the answer which he made them, did evidently expresse the truth. And having a long while debated the matter with my self, I said unto them, I know as well as you, that the Tiberians have offended: neither will I hinder you from spoiling their Citie, yet must you proceed to the execution thereof with some judgement. For the Tiberians alone do not betray our libertie, but others also, who are more accounted of in the countrey of Galilee. Stay therefore untill such time as I am thoroughly enformed, who they be that are authors of this treason, and then you shall have them all under your hands, with all those amongst them, whom you may particularly think worthy punishment. By these perswasions I wonne the people, who departed from me wholly contented and pacified. As for the messenger that was sent by the king, I caused him to be imprisoned, having respect to an urgent necessitie of mine own, which constrained me to depart out of the kingdome within a little while. And calling Crispus secretly unto me, I charged him to make those souldiers drunk, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all securitie fly back to the king. This Tiberias being ready to be destroyed, the second time by my government and providence, avoided at that time a great and fatall danger.

At the same time Iustus, the sonne of Pistus, fled unto the king without my knowledge: the cause of which flight of his, I will orderly expresse. As soon as the Romans had begun their warre against the Jews, the Tiberians concluded to obey the king, and in no sort to rebell against the Romanes. But Iustus egged them on to take arms, thirsting after alteration, and hoping both to obtain the government of Galilee, as of his own countrey: but his hope failed him of a successfull end; for the Galileans being enviously bent against the Tiberians, for those injuries they had suffered at their hands before the warre, could not allow Iustus to be their Governour. My self also, whom the people of Jerusalem put in trust with the government of Galilee, was oftentimes so much moved, that I failed little of killing Iustus, so intolerable was his wickednesse. He therefore fearing lest my displeasure should shorten his daies, went unto the king, supposing that he might live more freely and securely with him. The Sephorites beyond their expectation having escaped this first danger, wrote unto Crispus Gallus the second time, requiring him to come unto them, to the end that he might be the sooner seized of their Citie; or that he should send them forces to withstand the incursions of their enemies: and finally they wrought so much, that Gallus sent them store of horsemen, and after them footmen, who came by night, and were received into their Citie. But seeing that the countrey round about them was but in poore estate, by reason of the Roman horsemen, I took my souldiers, and came to Garizim, where I encamped some twenty stades off from Sephoris, and by night I approached the same, and set ladders to the wall, with which I entred a great number of my souldiers, and became master of the better part of the Citie; from whence notwithstanding we were afterwards constrained to retire, for that we knew not the place, killing before our departure twelve Roman footmen and two horsemen, with some Sephorites, to the onely losse of one of ours. Afterwards a fight happening between us and their horsemen in open field, we fought for a long time with disadvantage. For the Romanes having invironed me on all sides, my reward through the fear they conceived, began to retire. In this skirmish I lost one of my guard, called Iustus, who in times past had served in the very same place under the king. At that very time the kings forces both of horse and foot came thither, under the government of Silas Captain of the guard, who encamping some five stades off from Julias, beset the high wayes that bended towards Cana with men of warre, and the fort of Gamala, to hinder the inhabitants from receiving any commodities from the countrey of Galilee.

As soon as I received news hereof, I sent out two thousand souldiers, with Ieremy their Coronell: who shrowding themselves within a stade of Julias, neer unto the floud Jordan, offered nothing else but light skirmishes, untill such time as I had gathered three thousand souldiers more, and was come unto them. The next day having planted an ambush in a certain trench neer unto the enclosure of their camp, I rouled out the kings souldiers to skirmish, having first forewarned my souldiers to faine a flight, until such time as they had drawn their enemies as farre as the ambush, which they cunningly executed. But Silas supposing that our men fled for cowardice, set forward to follow them as fast as he might possible: but they that lay in ambush charged him on the back, and discomfited his army: and I presently turning and making head against them, constrained the kings forces to trust to their heels. At that time the estate of the countrey was at a good point, had not some cursed spirit thwarted mine honest purposes. For the horse whereon I roode, falling into a certain bogge, cast me on the ground:

A ground: whereby mine hand being thrust out of joynt about the wrift, I was carried into a borough of Cepharnom. My souldiers hearing hereof, and fearing lest some more sinister misfortune had befallne me, then indeed had done, restrained themselves from pursuing the enemy any further, and turned their backs through the grief they had conceived by reason of mine accident. Having therefore sent for Physitians, and caused myself to be dressed, I stayed there for that day; and being seized with a fever, I was carried by night to Taricheas, according to the advice of my Physicians.

B Silas and his souldiers having news of mine accident, recovered their courages: and understanding that we kept but slender watch in our camp, they laid an ambush by night on this side Jordan, with their horsemen, and as soon as the day appeared, he drew out our souldiers to fight: who willingly condescended thereunto, and being come into the Plain, they perceived the men that lay in ambush, by whom they were put to flight, and six of our men were slain. But they pursued their victory no further: For having news that certain souldiers had past the water of Taricheas to Julias, they were afraid and returned back.

Not long after, Vespasian arrived at Tyre, accompanied with king Agrippa. Against whom the Tyrians began to utter many reproaches, telling Vespasian that the king was both an enemy to the Tyrians and the Romanes, alleadging that Philip his Generall had betrayed the kings palace and the Romane army in Jerusalem, and that by the Kings Commission; Which when Vespasian understood, he reprov'd this impudent boldnesse of the Tyrians, for blaming a King of that power, and a friend to the Romanes: and advised the King to send Philip to Rome, to yeeld account of his actions. But notwithstanding that Philip was sent

C thither, yet presented he not himself before Nero; for finding him extremely busied with troubles and civill warres, he returned unto the King without doing any thing. When Vespasian was arrived at Ptolemais, the governours of the ten cities of Syria cried out against Justus the Tiberian, accusing him for burning of their boroughs. Vespasian therefore delivered him bound unto the king, to the end that the subjects of his kingdom might have him punished. But the King before that time, unwitting to Vespasian, had kept him prisoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sephorites also resorted to Vespasian to salute him, and receive a garrison from him, with their Commander Placidus, who made many roads into the countrey, and pursued them untill such time as Vespasian arrived in Galilee: of which arrivall

D I have amply spoken in my books of the Warres of the Jews, how he came; how he fought against me, the first time neer to the Citie of Taricheas: how I departed from thence to repair to Jotapata, my taking, my deliverance, and all my actions and fortunes during the warres of the Jews, and the siege of the Citie of Jerusalem. After the siege of Jotapata was ended, I was prisoner with the Romanes and kept very carefully: yet notwithstanding, Vespasian did me much honour. For by his commandment I married a virgin, that was one of those that had been taken captive in Cæsarea. But she remained not long time with me: for after I was set at libertie, and that I followed Vespasian, she retired her self to Alexandria. And after the Citie of Jerusalem was taken, Titus often solicited me to take that which I liked among the ruins of Jerusalem, promising to give it me. Being sent with Cerealis and one thousand horse into the Citie of Thecoa by the Emperour Titus, to espie if the place were fit for a camp; in returning from thence I saw divers prisoners, who were on the gibbet, amongst which were three of my familiars; whereat I was grieved in my soul, and I came and signified the same unto Titus with tears: who incontinently commanded that they should be ship, and did me great honour. As soon as we came to Rome, Vespasian had great care of me;

for he lodged me in his own house, where he kept before he was Emperour, and honoured me with the title of a citizen of Rome, and gave me an annuall pension in money, and as long as he lived, continued his good affection towards me, forgetting no kinde of bountie which he might use towards me. Whereupon I was so much envied, that I grew in danger thereby H to lose my life: For a certain Jew called Jonathan, having stirred up a sedition in Cyren, and gathered about him some two thousand inhabitants of the countrey, was the cause of their overthrow: and as touching himself, being bound by the governour of that countrey, and afterwards sent unto the Emperour, he said it was I that had sent him arms and money. But Vespasian knew his falsehood, and condemned him to death, and commanded him to be executed. After this, mine enemies objected divers crimes against me in regard that I was in good reputation: but God so wrought that I escaped them all. Moreover, I received in gift from Vespasian an ample possession in Judæa, and at that very time I forsook my wife, because her manners pleased me not, although she were the mother of my three children, of whom two are deceased, and the third, who was called Hircanus, is yet alive. After this I married a I wife that was born in Candie, and was by nation a Jew, and by birth noble, and one of the greatest reputation amongst the inhabitants, endowed with as laudable manners as any other vertuous woman whatsoever; as her after-life most plainly expressed. By her I had two sons, Justus, who was the eldest, and Simonides, who also was surnamed Agrippa. Thus farre as touching my domestick affairs. That bountie which I received from the hands of the Cæ-sars, hath alwayes continued mine. For after Vespasians death, Titus, who succeeded him in the Empire, continued the same favour which his father had shewed me. For although I were oftentimes accused, yet were not mine adversaries beleevd. Dominian, who succeeded him, augmented mine honours. For he punished those Jews that accused me, and gave order that the Eunuch and slave whom I kept to teach my sonne, and by whom I was accused, should be punished. He granted me exemption also from all the tributes of Judæa, which is one of the greatest honors that a man may receive. And as touching Domitie the Emperours wife, she always continued her good affection towards me. Behold here the short recital of my whole life: whereby let each man conjecture of my manners as him listeth.

But O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I have given and offered thee all this ancient History of our nation,
I will for this present pause in this place.

esteemed friend, M Anthony Palmer Esquire.

I R, my affection, that had rather be an Actor then an Orator (do well, then speak well,) hath pickt you out to be the Patron of this tragicall History of the Warres of the Iews. The reasons that drave me hereunto, are neither the expectance of worldly benefits, nor the fruitlesse up-shot of ostentation: but your vertue (which is not beloved respectively, but onely for it self) hath created this good conceit in me, vvhich (if you so please) your acceptance may continue. Now since, as the Philosopher supposeth, it is an action worthie a good man, to do good unto his friend; so it is no lesse commendable to accept an office of kindnesse from a friend. For by giving, vve bewray our vvell-vvishing; and by receiving, vve proportion and continue friendship: upon this ground I pray you build the good entertainment of my Present, and nourish this good custome in me (vvhich was usuall both amongst Grecians and Latins) I mean my Translation: vvhich if it please you, I have my vvish. As for my maligners, I expect no worse from them then Iason the Thessalian, who being assailed and wounded by an enemy (vvho had an intent to kil him) had an impostumation opened, that saved his life: their stab and strook of disgrace shall cure and heal the hidden and neglected infirmities of my minde; and notwithstanding, I shall both Genio & ingenio live to love you, and lament their vvant of charitie. THE FIRST OF THOSE SEVEN BOOKS, VVHICH VVERE

written by FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS, the sonne of MATTHIAS, as touching the Warre, and destruction of the Jews.

THE PREFACE.

In which the Author taxeth divers Historiographers, of untruth; and declareth his intent, and specifich the principall points of this Historie.

EOR as much as the warre which was enterprized betwixt the Jews and Romanes, hath (amongst all other) been the greatest that either hath been attempted in our age, or heard of in any other; either between citie and citie, or nation against nation: there have been some, who (rather building their discourse on the vain and unprobable report of others, then their own judgements) have (according to the manner of Orators) made a History of their hearsay, and have filled their discouses not onely with vanitie, but also with contradiction. Others there were (who for that they were witnesses or actors of the same) have according to their own fancies preferred many lies; either to flatter the Romanes, or exercise their hatred against the Jews: forging somewhiles accusations, otherwhiles breaking out into praises, without any observation of historicall veritie. For this cause, I Joseph the sonne of Matthias, by birth an Hebrew and a Citizen and Priest of Ierusalem: who in the beginning of these warres bare arms against the Romanes, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by necessitie) was present at all those things, which were attempted and prosecuted in those warres; have thought good to discourse in the Greek tongue (in favour of all those who acknowledge the soveraigntie of the Romane Empire) all that which heretofore in my own language I have imparted to those Barbarians that inhabite the East. For at such time (as I have already spoken) as these most bitter and busie warres took their beginning, the Romans were at civill warres among themselves: and as touching the Jews (who were in years valiant, and in wits turbulent) they being both strong in power, and rich in money, did so insolently abuse the time, that being animated by the greatnesse of those seditions and troubles; they somethiles swam in hope, sometimes sweltered in fear of possessing or losing certain soveraignties in the East. For the Jews hope was, that all those of their nation (even they who inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates) would have both followed them in their rebellion, & seconded their follies with their forces. Moreover, at that time the Frenchmen (who bordered upon the Romanes) suffered them not to live in peace: and the Ger-manes also began to take arms. Finally, after the death of Nero seditions reigned every where: so that by reason of the opportunitie of these times many men went about to make themselves Kings, and the souldiers whetted on with the covetous desire of gain, desired nothing more then trouble and alteration. For which cause, I think it a matter both worthy reproof, and ill-beseeming my reputation, if in so weightie affairs; I should suffer the truth to be smothered in uncertainties, and should permit the Parthians, Babylonians, and the furthest distant Arabians, and those of our nation inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabentines, to obtain the true knowledge of those events by mine industry; whilst the Grecians, and divers of those, who have not borne arms with the Romanes, being distracted with factions, and deceived by adulation, should be ignorant hereof. Yet some of these there be, who (notwithstanding their false informations) stick not to write Histories, not onely void of all truth, but also no wayes answerable to the subject which they undertake. For whilst they labour to dignifie and extoll the Romanes, they altogether suppress the same and fortunes of the Iews: yet cannot I conjecture by what means they may be held great, who triumph in the conquest of men so obscure and abject. Nay whilst they thus extoll the Romanes valour in conquering the Iews, they nothing at all respect the continuance of the warres, nor the multitude of the Romanes souldiers, nor the honour of their Captains, whose titles are much embased, if they (having laboured so much to conquer Ierusalem) should have any thing derogated from the honour and prosperity of their attempts. For mine own part, I am not resolved to contradict those who shall enhance the glory and noble actions of the Romanes, neither to extoll and dignifie the deserts of mine own nation, but my resolution is in all truth and sinceritie to set down each occurrent, without respect or partialitie towards either part. In performance whereof I will fashion my discourse according to the matter I entreat of, and as my grief and sorrow shall invite me to lament the miseries of my countrey: For the civil dissension that dismembred the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: and those tyrants that reigned amongst us, were such, who forcibly drew the Romanes with sword and fire to seek the desolation of our holy Temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himself can justifie, who destroyed the same, who during all those warres still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceived) were kept in awe by the seditious: And who oftentimes of his own accord deferred the surprizall of the Citie, purposely protracting the siege, to the intent that in the meane time the authors of the sedition and bloody wars might have leasure to repent and submit themselves. Now if any man think that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the tyrants and their theveries, or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost countrey, I accuse their villanies, and thereby transgresse the limits of a History, let it be imputed to my grief, and so pardoned. For amongst all the Cities that were ever governed by the Romanes, our Citie onely attained to the top of felicitie, which now alas is brought into extreme miserie, captivitie, and desolation. Nay, if all the misfortunes and calamities which the world from the beginning hath seen, be compared with the infelicitie and fall of the Iews, they are sleight and of no moment.

And to increase our sorrow, no forrainers, but our own familiar friends and countrey men have been the actors of our tragedy. Thus considered, if any man of too severe and Stoicall judgement shall reprehend this my lamentation, let such a one attribute the deeds I recount, to the History which I write; and reserve the lamentations and sorrows thereof to me, who am the Historiographer: although in my minde I may justly challenge the smooth-tongued Grecians, for that (notwithstanding these our so miserable, and so memorable warres happened in their dayes, in respect whereof all other former troubles were obscure and of no reckning) they have restrained their tongues and pens; and undertaken an overcurious silence, to the end they might carp at these with greater libertie, who undertake the publishing thereof, whom though in learning and eloquence they both exceed and out-strip, yet are they inferiour unto them in the matter and subject they intreat of. For they forsooth decipher and set down the valiant acts of the Assyrians and Medes, as who should say, the ancient writers had but coldly and scarce conceitfully handled the same: and yet God knoweth, they come so farre behinde those ancient authors in their writings, as they neither second them in sense, nor equall them in understanding. For such as in times past published any worthy History, endeavoured to write that which they themselves had seen: and for that each of them were eye-witnesses of those affairs they committed to writing, they more effectually performed all that which they promised, the rather for that they accounted it to be an act of dishonestie, to report and publish lies in stead of a History. And truly in my opinion that man is both worthy commendation and praise, who striveth by his studious endeavours, to register not onely the occurrences of times past, but also those memorable events that have happened in his dayes: and he onely and truly is to be accounted industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another mans works, but he that of himself compileth a History, whereof no man hath before-time written. For mine own part (the rather for that I am a stranger) I have been enforced to my no small labour and expence, to refresh the memory and truth of these events in the eares of the Greeks and Romanes. For as touching their own learned men, their mouths are alwayes open to gains and controversies; and so this purpose their tongues still runne on pattens in, if they come to a History wherein they should both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of those things that are past, here are they mumm, the travell is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leave the matter to their performance, who are incapable and unapt both in style and study, to register the noble actions of royal Princes.

Since therefore the Grecians make no account of the truth of history, it behooveth us both to esteem and honour it. Now to discover unto you the originall of the Iews, what their estate hath been in times past, and after what manner they departed out of Egypt, to shew what countries they conquered, and what Colonies they planted, were in my judgement both impertinent and to little purpose, considering that divers of mine own nation have before my time made and written an exact History of the noble attempts of our ancestors: yea many Greeks also have translated these mens writings into their own tongue,

A tongue, and have as truly, as rhetorically exemplified the same. I will therefore begin my History in that time where these writers and our own Prophets ceased, and set down at large all those wars that hapned in my time: and as for those things that exceed my knowledge and remembrance, I will onely touch them briefly, and in a word or two. First, how Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, took the City of Ierusalem, and possessed the same for the space of three years, and six moneths: and finally how he was driven out of that countrey by the Asmoneans. After this I will set down the dissensions that hapned amongst Antiochus successors for the kingdome, and how by this means they drew Pompey and the Romanes into the managing and meddling with their affairs. How Herod likewise the sonne of Antipater, being assisted by Sosius, utterly overthrew and canceled their felicitie and authority: and how in Augustus Cæsars time and after the death of Herod, and during the government of Quintilius Varo, a sedition was raised among the people: and how in the twelfth year of Neros reign the warre began to take head and continuance. That likewise which hapned in Cestius time, and what warlike executions the Iews performed in their first attempts and revolts, how they strengthened the cities and forts about them, and Nero (hearing of the great overthrow which his army received under Cestius their Generall, and fearing lest he should lose all) made Titus Vespasian the Generall of his army: who being attended by his eldest son, came into Iudæa accompanied with as great a company of Romanes as he could possibly gather: what number of their allies invaded and spoiled Galilee, what cities they surprized in that place, either by forcible assault, or by any other composition. Besides all these things, I will expresse what order and discipline the Romanes observe in their warres, and wherein they are accustomed to exercise their souldiers. I will note down also the places and nature of the countrey of Galilee, and the description of Iudæa, together with the mountains, lakes and fountains thereof, with all the properties of the same; not forgetting those miseries which the captive Cities suffered: neither how they were surprized. All which (together with all those evils and miseries which during those troubles befell me) will I discover, and discourse with all truth and diligence, the rather in that I publish this in their ears, who are no waies ignorant of them. After this I will set down how (upon the declining and downfall of the Iews) Nero died, and how, at such time as Vespasian had undertaken the expedition to Ierusalem, he was withheld from the action, to receive and enjoy the imperiall dignitie: and how at that instant when he returned himself into Egypt to establish that estate, the Iews began to mutiny among themselves, how many tyrants arose among them, who hatched much civill discord and debate in their government. Again, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the second time into Iudæa, and ranged over the countrey, and how and where he levied and encamped his armies. How and how oftentimes the citie hath been vexed by sedition, especially at such time as he himself was present. What onsets he gave, and how many mounds he raised in begirting the citie with a treble wall: the strength and provision of the city, the situation and plat-forme of the Temple, and the altars therein: the rites and ceremonies which were used upon festivall dayes, the seven purifications & offices of the Priests: the garments also of the high Priest, and the holy sanctuary of the Temple. All which I will recount without any dissimulation, or swerving from the truth of history. After this I will relate what crueltie the tyrants used against their own countrey-men, and what humonity the Romans shewed unto strangers, and how oftentimes Titus (who desired the safety both of the city and Temple) provoked and invited the seditious to mutuall amitie. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Iews (after these many and grievous wounds which they both suffered and sunk under, sometimes by war, otherwhiles by sedition, and many times by hunger) were at length overthrown to their utter confusion. Neither will I omit the slaughter of such as revolted, neither the punishment inflicted on those that were captive: but I will set down how the Temple was burned against Cæsars will, and what an infinit masse of sacred treasure was devoured by the fire. But to shut up the History, I will annex the surprizall of the citie, and what signes and wonders hapned before the same: the captivisie also of the tyrants themselves, and the number of those that were led away into captivisie: and what misery every one of them endured: how the Romanes continuing their warres, utterly razed the fortresses of their captives: finally, how Titus in travelling thorow the whole countrey established a forme of government therein; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All these things have I comprehended in seven Books: endeavouring as much as in me lyeth, to sie and avoyd all occasion of reproofe and reprehension from those men, who knew these affairs and were actors in the warres. All which I have done for their sakes, who rather affect truth, then follow their pleasure: and according to that order and forme I have proposed, I will begin and prosecute my style and history.

Ant. li. 12. c. 4.

At such time as Antiochus furnished Epiphanes, made warre against Sextus Pompeius for the whole government of Syria, there arose a sedition among the Jews: wherein every one endeavoured himselfe to have the Sovereigntie over others; and those of chiefeest authoritie and nobilitie amongst the rest, disdained to submit themselves to such as were their equals. At that time a certain man called Onias (who was one of the high Priests) having gotten the upper hand, did drive the sonnes of Tobias out of the City; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, besought him in all humility that he would leade his forces into Judæa; offering themselves to be his guides in that expedition and voyage. Antiochus (who long long before that time desired such an occasion) easily condescended to their request; and levying a great army, entred their countrey, and took the

A the city by force, and slew the most part of them, who favoured Ptolomey: and giving his souldiers libertie to sack the citie, he himselfe spoiled the Temple also, and for the space of three yeers and six moneths, forbade all sacrifices and ceremonies, which before-time were accustomed and used in that place. Whereupon Onias the high Priest fled unto Ptolomey, and having obtained a grant of a piece of ground from him, within the liberties and precinct of Heliopolis, he built a towne and Temple in that place, resembling the City and sanctuary in Jerusalem.

Antiochus al-

Jews.

But neither was Antiochus satisfied with the unexpected surprize of the city, nor with the pillage and slaughter of the citizens, but was so farre transported by his passions, and incensed with the remembrance of those evils which he sustained during the siege of the city, that he compelled the Jews to forsake the customes of their countrey, commanding them from that time forward to use no more circumcision of their children, but that they should immolate swine upon the Altar: which when all of them joyntly refused to obey, the most constant among them were for that cause put to death. Bacchides being made chiefe of the garrisons by the appointment of Antiochus, what with his innared crueltie, and the impious commandement that was left him, omitted no occasion to further his wicked impiety, inso- much as he particularly tormented such as were of noble birth, and qualitie: that each day for the most part, he represented unto them the fresh face and memory of the desolation of their city: till all of them at last being provoked and whetted on through the grievousnesse of that which both themselves and others indured, addressed themselves with confidence to prosecute their revenge. At length Matthias the sonne of Asmoneus, one of the Priests, who was born in a village called Modin, accompanied with his five sonnes and his own hous- hold armed with swords, slew Bacchides: and fearing the power and multitude of the ene- mies garrisons, speedily retired himselfe into the mountains. Thither resorted divers of the people unto him: for which cause he waxing more confident and couragious, came down from the mountains, and overcoming the captains of Antiochus, drave them out of the bor- ders of Judaea. At such time therefore as through his happy successe he became potent, and was by common consent of the people (for that he had delivered them from the subjection of strangers) made their Ruler: he died, leaving his eldest sonne who was called Judas, to succeed him in the government. Who fearing lest Antiochus would still continue warres a- gainst him, gathered together an army of his countrey men, and was the first among the Jews that made a league with the Romanes, and drave back Antiochus Epiphaneus at such time as he enforced himselfe once more to invade the borders of Judaea, repulsing him with a great overthrow. And whereas the remembrance of this victory was yet fresh in mens mindes and memory, he assaulted the garrison of the city: For as yet they were not destroyed (in which conflict he forced them to forsake the highest part thereof, which is called holy) and betake themselves into the lower part: and having obtained the Temple, he made every place clean, and compassed it with a wall, and made new vessels for the service in the Temple, and planted them therein, because those that had been before-time consecrated there, were prophaned. He builded likewise another Altar, and began to renew the accustomed sacri- fice, and observe the rites of religion.

Bacchides

wards the Jews.

Ant. lib. 8.
Matthias confederated with others, maketh warre against Antiochus.

E Scarcely was the city brought to the former estate, but Antiochus died, who left a son and heire behind him, who was not onely inheritor of his Kingdome, but also of his hatred a- gainst the Jews: who having gathered together fifty thousand footmen, and almost five thousand horsemen, and fourescore Elephants, entred by the mountains of Judaea, and took a town named Bethsara, neer which Judas met him in a place called Bethzachary, where the passage was something streight: and before the armies joynd battell, Elesazar, Judas bro- ther, seeing one Elephant higher then the rest, bearing a great tower on his back, and adorn- ed with golden furniture, thinking Antiochus had been there, ran from his company, and breaking the ranks of the enemies, came unto the Elephant: but he could not reach him (whom he deemed to be the King) he was so highly mounted, for which cause wounding the Elephant in the belly, the Elephant fell upon him, and pressed him to death: which act of his had no other successe but this, that by attempting so great a matter, he gave a testimony that he preferred his renown, before his life.

Ant. lib. 13.
cap. 14. 15.
Elesazar dieth being slain by an Elephant.

F Now he that governed the Elephant was but a private person, and although by hap Anti- ochus had been there, Elesazar had achieved nothing else in this valiant attempt: but yet he adventured his life, under hope to performe some valiant exploit. And this act of his was a preface unto his brother of the event of the whole warre that ensued. For the Jews fought stoutly, and a long time, but yet Antiochus army (being both more in number and more pro- perous) obtained the victory, so Judas therefore after the losse of many of his company, fled unto unto the Gophonites, with those of his side who escaped: And Antiochus went to Jerusalem, from whence after some stay he departed for want of necessities, leaving a sufficient garri- son; as for the rest of his army, he led them for the winter time into Syria. Yet notwith- standing the Kings departure Indus rested not: but encouraged by many of his nation, who daily came unto him, and gathering also together those who escaped out of the former bat- tell, at a village named Adasa, he fought with Antiochus Captains, where after much and ma- ny approbations of his valour in assaulting and slaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himselfe at length was slain, and within a few dayes after, his brother Iohn also was be- trayed, and slain by their treacheries who favoured Antiochus.

CHAP. II.

Of the succession of Princes, from JONATHAN untill ARISTOBULUS.

After him succeeded his brother Jonathan, who carefully studied for the peace and securitie of his people, and fortified himselfe by the friendship of the Romanes, and was reconciled to Antiochus his son; yet did none of all these things profit him, or acquit him from danger. For the tyrant Tryphon (who was tutor to Antiochus) laying wait for him, and seeking to spoile him of his friends, took Jonathan at such time as he came with a small company to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an army against Judæa: from whence being repulsed by Simon, Jonathan's brother, and overcome by him, in displeasure and revenge thereof, he slew Jonathan.

But Simon valiantly bestirring himself in the government and guide of the affairs of the common-wealth, took Zara, Joppe, and Jamnia (which were bordering towns:) and over- coming the garrison at Accaron, he destroyed the Citie, and assisted Antiochus against Tryphon who besieged Dora, before that expedition which he made against the Medes. Yet would not the greedy minde of the King be satisfied, notwithstanding that Simon had thus faithfully served and assisted him in the death of Tryphon; but that within short time after he sent unto Cendebeus (who was the Generall of the army) commanding him to sack and spoile Judæa, and to take Simon, and make him a slave. But Simon though aged in yeers, fought both youthfully and valiantly, and sent his sonnes with the most resolute men he had, before, against Antiochus, and himselfe with the residue of his army, assaulted another quar- ter of their enemies campe; and having laid many ambushes even in the mountains, he in every place was victorious: and after this his most famous victory, he was proclaimed high Priest, and delivered the Jews from the government of the Macedonians, under which they had been two hundredth and seventy yeers. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolomæus his sonne in law, he was murdered at a banquet; who imprisoning his wife and two sonnes, sent cer- tain men to kill the third sonne, whose name was Iohn, otherwise called Hircanus. But the young man understanding the successe of his fathers voyage, hastened unto the City accom- panied with a great multitude; for he greatly hoped that the people would remember his fathers prowesse, especially because Ptolomæus iniquitie was hated of all men; Ptolomæus also hastened to enter the Citie at another gate: but he was speedily repulsed by the people who had already received Hircanus. For which cause he presently retired himselfe into a Castle named Dagon, situate beyond Jericho.

After that Hircanus had obtained the office of the high Priest, which was left him by his father, and had offered sacrifices unto God, he led forth his forces with all speed against Ptolomæus, hoping to help and deliver his mother and brethren that were detained prisoners with him: and assaulting the castle, notwithstanding that in all other things he had the better hand, yet was he overcome by just grief and compassion. For at such time and so often as Ptolomæus perceived himself to be in danger, he brought Hircanus's mother and brethren upon the wals, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatening to cast them down from the wall, except Hircanus would presently depart. For which cause Hircanus was more moved with compassion and fear, then with anger and wrath. But his mother being no wales dismayed with stripes which she endured, nor with death wherewith she was threat- ned, lifted up her hands to her son, beseeching him that in regard of her miseries, he would not be moved to spare so impious a person, for she esteemed her death threatened by Ptolomæus, dearer then immortalitie it self; if so be he might receive just punishment for the vil- lany which he had impiously committed against their house. But when Iohn had perceived the resolute minde of his mother and heard her intreatie; he was moved to assault the Castle, and straightway seeing her beaten and torn, he relented with compassion, and was even

A even filled with griefe. By which meanes the siege continued long, and the Jubilee year was come, which falleth out every seventh year: wherein the Jews cease from all affaires, as their wont is every seventh day. Ptolemæus delivered from the siege by this accident and occasion, put Iohns mother and his brethren to death, and afterwards fled to Zeno the Tyrant of Philadelphia, who was also surnamed Cotylas.

In the mean while, Antiochus being grievously vexed at that which Simon had done unto him, sent his army into Judæa, and besieged Hircanus in Jerusalem, who opening David's Sepulcher (who had been one of the richest amongst all the kings of Judæa) took more then three thousand talents of money from thence, and wrought so much with Antiochus, that upon the payment of three hundred talents of money, he made him raise his siege and depart the countrey. This Hircanus was the first of all the Jews that with his own goods maintained out landers and souldiers. But so soon as Antiochus had bent his power and forces against the Medes, he took handfast of that opportunity he had offered him, to revenge himself, and presently assaulted the townes of Syria, assuring himself he should finde them (as indeed they were) void of souldiers to defend them. Whereupon he took Medaba and Samea, with the places thereunto adjoyning, Sichem and Garizim, which border upon the Chuthæans, who inhabit the places adjoyning to the Temple, that is made after the imitation of that which is at Jerusalem. Moreover, he took many Cities of Idumæa, and amongst the rest Doreon, and Marisa: and coming into Samaria (where now Sebastæ is situate, which was builded by Herod) he besieged it on every side, and left his two sons Aristobulus and Antigonus, to continue the siege, who diligently besieged the place. There was such a famine in the city, that they were constrained to eat unaccustomed meats. For which cause, they required aide of Antiochus, surnamed Spondius, who willingly assisted them, but he was overcome by Aristobulus and Antigonus, and was pursued by the aforesaid brethren unto Scythopolis, whither he then retired himself: but they retiring again unto Samaria, besieged the Citie, and at last taking it by force, destroyed the same, and led away their inhabitants captives. Whilest thus fortune favoured them more and more, they ceased not to pursue their good successe, but led their army to Scythopolis: and taking it, they divided and spoiled all the countrey.

CHAP. III.

of Aristobulus, Antigonus, Judas Essæus, Alexander, Theodorus, and Demetrius.

His felicitie and good hap of Iohn and his sonnes, was accompanied with the envy of many of his countrey men: and this discontent of theirs, was the cause of a mutinie. For divers of the Jews rising up in arms against them, were so much over-ruled by their ambitious passion, that they could not contain themselves from the prosecution of an open and bloody warre: wherein notwithstanding they were put to the worst. From that day forward Iohn passed the remainder of his life in all felicitie and happinesse, and after he had governed the Common-weal for the space of thirtie three years, he departed this life, leaving behinde him five valiant sons. He was a man truly happy, and so favoured by Fortune, that he had no occasion to complain of her niggardice in bountie. Finally, he alone might justly boast himself of three excellent endowments: first of all, that he was the Prince of his countrey: secondly, that he was high Priest: thirdly, a Prophet, to whom God so spake, that he was ignorant of no future accidents. He foresaw and foretold that his two eldest sons should not continue long in the government (whose lives are worth rehearfall, although they much declined from their fathers felicitie:) for the eldest sonne Aristobulus, after his fathers death translated the principalltie into a kingdome, and was the first that put a Crowne on his head; foure hundredth, eightie and one yeeres and three moneths, after the deliverance of the people from the captivitie of Babylon. As for Antigonus (who was his second brother, and whom in appearance he seemed to love most intirely) he made him partaker of his dignitie, and committed the residue of them to prison. He imprisoned his mother also, for that shee had contended with him as touching the principalltie, (which Iohn had solely committed to her dispose) and was so farre given over to all kind of crueltie, that he not onely kept her prisoner in bonds, but also put her to death by famine. But the revenge of this his impietie was this, that he slaughtered his own brother Antigonus whom hee intirely beloved, and made both a competitor and partner with him in the kingdome. For by reason of those scandalous slanders, which his envious and malignant courtiers contrived and invented against him, he commanded him to be put to death.

Nathelesse, upon their first information, Aristobulus (overmastered by brotherly affection) G gave them no credit, the rather for that he was certainly assured, that all things for the most part which were objected against him, were rather enforced upon envie, then alleadged on good ground.

But when as Antigonus returned from the warre, attended with many testimonies of his valour and prowesse, upon that festivall time, wherein according to the custome of our coun-tre, we celebrate the feast of Tabernacles; it hapned at that time, that Aristobulus fell sick and was diseased. Antigonus therefore about the end of those festivall daies being attended by his armed men, ascended up into the Temple to offer sacrifice, and the rather resorted he thither in greater pompe and majesty, because he intended to honour his brother. Hereupon, certain curled and wicked detractors repaired to the King, buzzing in his eares, that this great guard of souldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and that his haughtie resolution and Kingly presence, was rather for a Sovereigne, then a subject: inferring hereby, that he entred the city in this Equipage, with an intent to murther him, not contenting himself to have the onely honour of the kingdome except he might reduce the power and possession thereof into his own hands. Aristobulus though unwillingly, yet at last being wonne to be-leeve them, desirous (in seeming not to suspect) to shew himself provident, commanded his guard to hide themselves in a certain obscure place under the ground: as for himself, he took up his lodging in a certain Castle, which in times past was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia: given his archers this commission, that if Antigonus came unarmed, they should let him passe; if otherwise, that they should kill him. He sent certain messengers also to Antigonus, requiring him to repair unto him disarmed. But the envious Queen prevented this good intent of his by a subtrill stratagem plotted and acted by those, that with her conspired against him. For she perswaded those that were put in trust to discharge this message to discover nothing of that, which the King had commanded them: but to signifie unto Antigonus, that his brother having intelligence, that he had made himself many accomplished and compleat armours, with other faire and worthy furniture for the war in Galilee (which by reason of Antigonus, sudden departure from that place, and his own instant infirmity he might not behold) would count it no little favour and felicity to behold and see him in his war like ornaments. Which when Antigonus understood (who by reason of his brothers disposition suspected no mischief) he armed himself, and resorted unto him, intending to delight and content him with his musters. But no sooner arrived he in the streight which is called the tower of Straton, but the guard of Aristobulus set upon him, and slaughtered him, yeelding by this meanes a demonstrative and certain testimonie, that detraction distracteth and destroyeth all good nature and friendship, and that amongst all our most accounted affections, there is no one so defended and fortified as may abate the edge of envie.

At this time also who would not wonder at a certain man called Judas? who being by birth an Essene, was blessed with this felicity in his prophecies, that his predictions were neither touched with mistaking, nor tainted with lying. This man perceiving how Antigonus passed thorow the Temple, cried out to his familiars who attended him in no small number (for ordinarily divers of his disciples did attend upon him:) Ah, how happy were it for me at this present, if I were dead, sith that truth dieth before me, and some one of my predictions are found faulty and deficient? For behold, Antigonus yet liveth, who should this day have dwelt with death. The place which was destinated for his departure is the tower of Straton, which is distant from this place some sixe hundred foulds, and yet notwithstanding there are but 4. hours of the day to be past: now therefore is the time wherein my divination shall be falsified. Having spoken to this effect, the old man sate him down being altogether disconsolate and pensive, untill such time as within a while after it was told him that Antigonus was slaine in a place under ground, which was called the tower of Straton. being of the same name with Cæsarea which is situate upon the sea-coast, which was the occasion that Judas staggered in his divination.

The sorrow which incontinently seized Aristobulus, for committing this hainous murder, augmented and increased his sicknesse in such sort, that his soule was continually troubled with the thought of his sin, and his body through extreme heat of passion dried up, and the griefe that he felt was so vehement, that his entrailles became exulcerate, so that he voided bloud in great abundance. And it so fell out by the divine providence, that one of his servants, who was deputed to that office, bearing out that blood which came from him, missed his way, and came to that place where Antigonus had bin slain, wherein as yet there appeared some signes and staines of the bloudshed of Antigonus, on which he powred out the bloud of the murderer Aristobulus. Which when they perceived who stood hard at hand, they began to

A to cry out with a loud voice, as if the servant had purposely spilled the blood in that place. Aristobulus hearing this cry, demanded the cause thereof: and the more that each man fled and feared to discover the same unto him, the more instantly sought he to understand the truth; so that at length after he had used threats and violence, he was certified by some one of that which had past: Whereupon his eyes were suddenly filled with tears, so that in vehement agonie of minde, he at last cried out and said: It is impossible, but that the great eye of the divine Majesty should see my wicked acts, and the sudden vengeance of my brothers bloodshed should pursue and overtake me. How long, O thou impudent body, wilt thou detain a soul already condemned and adjudged to my mother and dead brother? How long shall I thus lingeringly languish in spending a parcell of my blood unto them? Let them take it all at once, and let not the divine vengeance laugh any longer to see the effusion of mine entrails. This said, he died after he had scarcely reigned one year.

B His wife after his death delivered his brother Alexander from prison, and anointed him King, who was both the eldest and seemed to be the most stayed among the rest of his brethren. Who growing by this means to be both proud and potent, put one of his brethren to death, for aspiring and hunting after the kingdom: as for the other that remained alive, in that he contented himself with a private and contemplative life, he kept him neer about him. He made warre also against Ptolomee that was called Lathyrus, who had surprized the citie of Asoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the sword: nathelesse, Ptolomee's side obtained the victory, who retiring himself into the countrey of Ægypt, by reason that his mother Cleopatra pursued him with open warre; Alexander forcibly entred the city of Gadara, and the fort of Amathunt (which was one of the greatest of all those that were round about Jordan) in which place Theodore, Zenos Sonne had hoorded up his chiefeft and most precious moveables, who suddenly setting upon him, recovered all that which was his, and furthermore laid hands on the Kings carriage: in seizing which, he slaughtered many Jews, to the number of ten thousand. But Alexander, after he had recovered this losse, invaded the frontire towns upon the sea-coast, and wonne Raphia, and Gaza, and Anthedon, which afterwards by king Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered and overcome these places, the common sort of the Jews raised a mutiny against him during a certain solemn and holy feast: for all mutinies and seditions are commonly raised at banquets: and it is thought that he could not have prevailed against those treacheries, had he not been assisted by the Pisidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to help him, for the Syrians, he refused to hire them, by reason of their naturall hatred they bare against the Jews. Having therefore slain eight thousand of the rebels, he warred upon Arabia; and overcoming the Galzadites, and Moabites (and imposing upon them a tribute) he returned to Amathunt: and whereas Theodore was daunted with his prosperous successe, he finding the Castle without any to defend it, razed it unto the ground. After this, he presently assaulted Oboda, king of the Arabians: who having laid ambushments in the countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for such a purpose, discomfited him and his whole army, being driven thence into a deep valley, where they were pestered with a multitude of Camels.

E But Alexander escaped unto Jerusalem, where the people who had conceived a hatred against him, being encouraged by his great losse and slaughter of men, began again to rebell: but then also he overcame them, and in six yeers space, at sundrie battels he slew above fiftie thousand Jews; notwithstanding, he never rejoyced in his victory, because the strength of his countrey was consumed thereby. For which cause giving over his warres, he began to seek the peoples favour by sweet and milde speeches: but they so much hated his inconstant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he might do to winne their favours, they answered, If he would die, for that scarcely they would pardon him if so be he were dead, who had committed so many heinous crimes. And thereupon the Jews sent unto Demetrius, surnamed Acarm for help, who in hope of great rewards came and joyned his forces with the Jews about Sichem: where Alexander met them both, with a thousand horsemen and six thousand footmen, that were hired (having at that time ten thousand Jews his favourites) and of the contrarie part there were three thousand horsemen, and fourty thousand footmen. Before the fight began, the two Kings sent messengers one unto anothers Armie, perswading one anothers men to forsake their colours and Captains: for Demetrius hoped that Alexanders hired men would have forsaken Alexander and come unto him, and Alexander hoped that the Jews that followed Demetrius, would have left Demetrius and come to him. But when both parts perceived that the Jews continued obstinate in their purpose, and the Greeks kept their fidelitie, the two Armies encountered, in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand (although Alexanders hirings evidently shewed strength

A to cry out with a loud voice, as if the servant had purposely spilled the blood in that place. Aristobulus hearing this cry, demanded the cause thereof: and the more that each manifested and feared to discover the same unto him, the more instantly sought he to understand the truth; so that at length after he had used threats and violence, he was certified by some one of that which had past: Whereupon his eyes were suddenly filled with tears, so that in vehement agonie of minde, he at last cried out and said: It is impossible, but that the great eye of the divine Majesty should see my wicked acts, and the sudden vengeance of my brothers bloodshed should pursue and overtake me. How long, O thou impudent body, wilt thou detain a soul already condemned and adjudged to my mother and dead brother? How long shall I thus lingeringly languish in spending a parcell of my blood unto them? Let them take it all at once, and let not the divine vengeance laugh any longer to see the effusion of mine entrails. This said, he died after he had scarcely reigned one year.

His wife after his death delivered his brother Alexander from prison, and anointed him King, who was both the eldest and seemed to be the most stayed among the rest of his brethren. Who growing by this means to be both proud and potent, put one of his brethren to death, for aspiring and hunting after the kingdom: as for the other that remained alive, in that he contented himself with a private and contemplative life, he kept him neer about him. He made warre also against Ptolomee that was called Lathyrus, who had surprized the citie of Asoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the sword: nathelesse, Ptolomee's side obtained the victory, who retiring himself into the countrey of Ægypt, by reason that his mother Cleopatra pursued him with open warre; Alexander forcibly entred the city of Gadara, and the fort of Amathunt (which was one of the greatest of all those that were round about Jordan) in which place Theodore, Zenos Sonne had hoorded up his chiefeft and most precious moveables, who suddenly setting upon him, recovered all that which was his, and furthermore laid hands on the Kings carriage: in seizing which, he slaughtered many Jews, to the number of ten thousand. But Alexander, after he had recovered this losse, invaded the frontire towns upon the sea-coast, and wonne Raphia, and Gaza; and Anthedon, which afterwards by king Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered and overcome these places, the common sort of the Jews raised a mutiny against him during a certain solemne and holy feast: for all mutinies and seditions are commonly raised at banquets: and it is thought that he could not have prevailed against those treacheries, had he not been assisted by the Pisidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to help him; for the Syrians, he refused to hire them, by reason of their naturall hatred they bare against the Jews. Having therefore slain eight thousand of the rebels, he warred upon Arabia; and overcoming the Galadites, and Moabites (and imposing upon them a tribute) he returned to Amathunt: and whereas Theodore was daunted with his prosperous successe, he finding the Castle without any to defend it, razed it unto the ground. After this, he presently assailed Oboda, king of the Arabians: who having laid ambushments in the countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for such a purpose, discomfited him and his whole army, being driven thence into a deep valley, where they were pestered with a multitude of Camels.

E But Alexander escaped unto Jerusalem; where the people who had conceived a hatred against him, being encouraged by his great losse and slaughter of men, began again to rebel: but then also he overcame them, and in six yeers space, at sundrie battels he slew above fiftie thousand Jews; notwithstanding, he never rejoyced in his victory, because the strength of his countrey was consumed thereby. For which cause giving over his warres, he began to seek the peoples favour by sweet and milde speeches: but they so much hated his inconstant and variable maners, that when he demanded of them what he might do to winne their favours, they answered, If he would die, for that scarcely they would pardon him if so be he were dead, who had committed so many hainous crimes. And thereupon the Jews sent unto Demetrius, surnamed Acernus for help, who in hope of great rewards came and joyned his forces with the Jews about Sichem: where Alexander met them both, with a thousand horsemen and six thousand footmen, that were hired (having at that time ten thousand Jews his favourites) and of the contrarie part there were three thousand horsemen, and fourty thousand footmen. Before the fight began, the two Kings sent messengers one unto anothers Armie, perswading one anothers men to forsake their colours and Captains: for Demetrius hoped that Alexanders hired men would have forsaken Alexander and come unto him, and Alexander hoped that the Jews that followed Demetrius, would have left Demetrius and come to him. But when both parts perceived that the Jews continued obstinate in their purpose, and the Greeks kept their fidelitie, the two Armies encountered, in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand (although Alexanders hirelings evidently shewed strength strength and courage.) But the end of this victory was such as neither party expected: for they who sent for Demetrius, after his victory did forsake him; and fortune changing her colours, six thousand Jews fled unto Alexander into the mountains, whither for safety he had betaken himselfe. This revolting much displeased and discouraged Demetrius, for he now thought that Alexander uniting his forces, was able to bid him battell, and he feared that all the Jewes would at that present follow Alexander: for which cause he returned home. Yet the rest of the Jewes having thus lost the help of Demetrius, would not for all this desist from their rebellion; nay they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them being slain) he drave the rest into the City of Bemeselin, and when he had surprized and sackt the Citie, he led them captives into Jerusalem. But immoderate anger turned his cruelty into impiety: for having crucified eight hundredth captives in the midst of the Citie, he killed their wives, and the children he massacred before their mothers faces; and this pitifull spectacle he beheld with pleasure, drinking and making merry with his concubines. Whereat the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the countrey of Judæa, who staid in banishment during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by those actions sought for the tranquillitie of his Kingdome, which he obtained not but with long time and great difficultie, he ceased to make warre against his countrey.

AFTER this, Antiochus (who likewise was called Dionysius, the brother to Demetrius, who was the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised up new broiles against Alexander, who fearing him because he had prepared warre against the Arabians, drew a deepe trench along that ground which lyeth between Antipatru, and the Sea-coast of Joppe: and before the trench he builded a very high wall, and raised towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keep out Antiochus, but that burning the towers, and filling up the trenches, he entred and passed over them with his forces. And not tarrying at that time to revenge himself of him who had thus forbidden him passage, he presently marched forward against the Arabians. But the King of Arabia retyring himself into certain places of his countrey which were fittest for defence, and returning suddenly to battell with his horsemen (who were in number 10000.) rushed hastily upon Antiochus souldiers, and found them unprovided: so that a hot skirmish began betwixt them, in which the souldiers of Antiochus, whilest he lived, shewed themselves valiant (though they were on every side massacred by the Arabians; but so soon as he was slain (who was alwaies ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled: and the greatest part of them were slain in the battell and in flight: as for those that escaped, they fled into the town of Cana, where they all (except very few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus being incited by the hatred they bare to Ptolomy the sonne of Minus, sent for Aretas, and established him King over Coelosyria: who warring against Judæa, and overcoming Alexander in battell, retired himselfe upon composition. Alexander having taken Pella, resorted once more to the town of Gerasa, in that he was desirous of Theodorus riches: and took the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with three wals: and that upon every wall there was planted a garrison. He took Gaulan and Seleucia and that town which is called the valley of Antiochus. Moreover, having taken Gamala, which was a most strong Castle, and imprisoned the Governour thereof, who was called Demetrius, because he was a wicked person, he returned into Judæa, after he had spent three yeers in warre: where for his prosperous successe he was joyfully received of his nation. But no sooner ceased he from warre but he fell sick, and falling into a quartane ague, he thought that he should drive away his sicknesse, if he employed himself in some businesse: for which cause being not rid of his disease, he applied himself to warre, and labouring above his strength, amidst those tumults yeelded up the ghost in the 37. year of his reign: leaving the kingdome to Alexandra his wife, fully accounting that the Jewes would in all things obey her, because that she alwaies by misliking and seeking to hinder his cruelty and iniquitie, had won the hearts of the people. Neither was he deceived; for she being admired for her piety amongst them, obtained the principality: the rather for that she was well acquainted with the customes of her countrey, and even from her

A her childhood detested them, who violated the holy law. She had by Alexander two sonnes, the eldest was called Hircanus, whom by reason of his years she proclaimed high Priest, and because of his dull nature, she thought that though he were in Princely authority, yet he would molest no man: and therefore also made him King. As for the youngest sonne Aristobulus, because he was of a hot spirit, she was willing that he should lead a private life.

Now there was a certain sect among the Jews, which were called Pharisees, who joyned themselves with the Queen: these people were thought to be of the godliest sort, and to be more skilful then other in interpreting the Scriptures: and for that cause Alexandra favoured them the more, because she was superstitiously given to religion. These having by little and little insinuated themselves into the favour of a simple woman, now did domineer at their pleasure, displacing, disposing, imprisoning, and restoring to liberty whom they pleased, for no other purpose, but that they might enjoy the profits and commodities of the kingdome, and Alexandra bare all charges. This Queen was alwayes desirous of high attempts, and daily studied to increase her wealth: she levied two armies, and hired a great many strangers, whereby she did not onely strengthen her own countrey, but also made her self to be feared of other nations. She ruled others, but her self was ruled by the Pharisees, who at last killed Diogenes, who was a gallant man, and highly in favour with King Alexander, affirming that through his counsell the King commanded those eight hundred before mentioned to be crucified: and further, they perswaded the Queen Alexandra, that she should put to death all others, through whose counsell Alexander her husband had been incited against those eight hundred. The Queen being blinded with superstition, thought it unlawfull to deny any thing which they requested: so that they put to death whom they pleased, till such time as the chiefe of those, who were in this danger, in humble wise came to Aristobulus, who perswaded his mother to spare them for their dignity, and banish others, whom she thought had deserved punishment: who having obtained their liberty, dispersed themselves thorow the whole countrey. Now Alexandra sent an army to Damascus, and because Protemius daily vexed the City, she took it without doing any thing worthy of memory: she did sollicite Tigranes King of Armenia with gifts and promises (who with an army had besieged Protemius wherein Cleopatra was) but he for fear of troubles in his own countrey, in that Lucullus had entered into Armenia, withdrew himself from thence.

D In the mean time Alexandra being sick, her youngest sonne Aristobulus with his servants (which were many in number, all trusty, and in the heat of their young years) got all the Castles: and hiring souldiers with the money he found in those Castles, he proclaimed himself King. But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) imprisoned the wife and children of Aristobulus in a Castle near unto the North part of the Temple, which in old time was called Baris (as we said before) afterwards Alexander being Emperour, it was called Antonia, as in like maner Sebasto and Agrippias other Cities, were named of Augustus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before she could revenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Aristobulus had done him. This Queen reigned nine years, and left Hircanus in possession of all, whom during her life time she had advanced to the kingdome. But Aristobulus being both stronger in power, and more esteemed in authoritie, encountered with his brother about Jericho, where many of Hircanus souldiers forsaking their King, fled unto Aristobulus: for which cause, both he and the remnant of those that followed him, were forced to flee into the castle called Antonia, where he found hostages to redeem them. For (as we have already said) Aristobulus wife and children were imprisoned in that place: and lest any worse mishap should befall him, he concluded a peace, upon condition that Aristobulus should be King, and that he as brother to the King, would content himself with other dignities. Upon these conditions they were made friends in the Temple, wherein the presence of all the people, they in most friendly sort embraced each other: which when they had done, they changed houses, and Aristobulus went into the Kings Palace, and Hircanus unto Aristobulus house.

Now a sudden sene invaded all the enemies of Aristobulus when they saw him (contrary to all expectation) made King, and especially Antiochus above all others, whom Aristobulus long time had hated. This Antiochus was an Idumean borne, and for his nobilitie and riches, was the chiefe and best reputed of his nation. This man perswaded Hircanus to flee unto Arctas King of Arabia, and crave his help to be him in his Kingdome.

dome. Furthermore, he perswaded Aretas likewise to receive Hircanus, and to help him to recover his kingdome, speaking much against the manners of Aristobulus, and praising Hircanus, adding that he being King of so famous a nation, ought to assist those who were unjustly oppressed; and that Hircanus had manifest injury offered him; being forced to forsake his Kingdome, which by the right of succession was due unto him. After he had thus made his way, he in the night time took Hircanus and fled with him forth of the Citie: and making all haste possible, they arrived at a towne called Petra, with safetie (which is a towne where the Kings of Arabia were accustomed to keep their Court) there he delivered Hircanus into the Kings hands, and through many gifts and intreaties obtained the favour that he might be conducted into his kingdome. And to the effecting of the same, Aretas gave him an Army of fiftie thousand horse and foot which power since Aristobulus was not able to resist, he was overcome upon the first onset, and was forced to flee unto Jerusalem: and he had been surely taken, if Scaurus a Captaine of the Romans by taking opportunitie at those troubles, had not raised the siege. For Pompey the Great, (who warred against Tigranes) sent him out of Armenia into Syria: who coming to Damascus, found it newly taken by Mastellus and Lallius, who dismissing them from thence, and finding how matters stood in Judæa, hasted thither in hope of a booty. So soone as he entred into the confines of the countrey, both of the brethren sent Embassadors unto him, desiring him to take their parts: but Aristobulus having sent him 300 talents, he neglected to doe Justice; for having received that summe, Scaurus sent messengers unto the Arabians and Hircanus, threatening the displeasure of the Romans and Pompey, except they would presently raise their siege: for which cause Aretas being much abashed, returned out of Judæa unto Philadelphia, and Scaurus repaired unto Damascus. Yet sufficed it not Aristobulus, that he had escaped from being taken, but that gathering all his forces together, he pursued his enemies: and joyning battell with them about Papyron, he slew sixe thousand of them, in which number was Cephala Antipaters brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being destitute of the Arabians help, were driven to hope for succour even at their adversaries hand. For which cause, as soone as Pompey after he had entred Syria came to Damascus, they in humble maner came to him, and giving him many gifts, protested unto him that which before they had done to Aretas; earnestly requesting him, that he would consider the violence offered by Aristobulus; and restore Hircanus to the Kingdome: to whom both by yeers and maners it was due.

Meane-while Aristobulus slept not, but having corrupted Scaurus, came in as royall pompe as he could; but not abiding to debase himself, and thinking it disparagement in more adject maner then becomed a King to seeke his own commoditie, returned from Diospolis. Whereat Pompey being angry, at the request of Hircanus and his followers, he went against Aristobulus, accompanied both with the Roman Army and the Syrians, who assisted them. When they had passed Pella and Scythopolis, and came to Corea (where the confines of Judæa begin) as they passed thorow the midst of the countrey, they understood that Aristobulus was fled to Alexandrium (which was a Castle richly built and situate upon a very high hill.) Pompey arriving in that place sent messengers unto him, commanding him to descend; but he because he was called in question about the kingdome, determined rather to hazard himself, then obey. But when he saw that the people began to feare, and that his friends willed him to think of the power of the Romans, whose strength he was no waies able to resist; he allowed their counsell and came unto Pompey: where having alleadged many reasons to shew that he had just title unto the Crowne, he returned again into the Castle. And afterwards being urged by his brother to come and plead his title, he came and returned thither again, without contradiction from Pompey. Thus wandred he betwixt hope and feare, and doubting how the matter would go with him, he came to Pompey as it were to entreat him to pardon all, and returned again unto the mountain, lest he should seem to derogate any thing from the majesty of a King; yet because Pompey willed him to depart from his Castles, and to warn his Governors thereof to do the like (whom he had commanded to disobey, except they received letters written by his own hand) in this he fulfilled Pompeys minde: yet being angry and discontented he departed into Jerusalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey. But Pompey not thinking it best to let him have time to prepare himself, followed him with all speed, and so much the willinger, because that neer unto Jericho he had news of Mithridates his death, even in the fruitfulest place of Judæa, where there are great store of palme and balm. This balsam is a shrub whose stamme being cut with sharp stones, droppeth balm out of the wounds thereof, which men gather as it droppeth from the wounds thereof. After he had rested there that night, he in the morning hasted to Jerusalem: At whose sudden arrivall Aristobulus being daunted, in humble maner came unto him; and

A and promising him money, and to yeeld himself and the Citie into his hands; he by this means appealed Pompeys anger. But he performed no part of his promise; for Aristobulus his associates would not suffer Gabinus (who was sent for the money) to enter into the Citie: For which cause Pompey being moved to displeasure, put Aristobulus in hold: and coming neer the Citie, he took a view at what place it might be easiest entred, for he did not lightly perceive how he might batter the wals, they were so strong. Moreover, there was a huge ditch before the wall, and hard by he beheld the Temple so strengthened, that although the Citie were taken; yet it might be a second refuge for the enemy. Whilest thus he long deliberated what to do, there arose a sedition within the Citie, wherein Aristobulus confederates thought it meet to fight, and deliver the King out of prison: but those that favoured Hircanus, would that the gates should be opened to Pompey. At last Aristobulus friends having the worst, fled into the Temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the last, they cut down the bridge, by which men goe out of the Citie, into the Temple. When the rest had received the Romanes into the Citie, and delivered unto them the Kings Palace, Pompey sent a Captaine called Piso with souldiers to seize the same; who leaving a garrison in the town (seeing he could perswade none of them that were in the Temple to peace) prepared all places about it to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends shewed themselves ready to helpe them with counsell, and to doe whatsoever they were commanded. Pompey at the North side filled the ditch and valley with all kinde of matter, which his souldiers carried: although that by reason of the huge depth, and for that the Jews made resistance, it was a thing hard to be done: and it had been left undone, had not Pompey (observing the seventh day, wherein the Jews religion forced them to abstaine from all labour,) caused it to be filled upon those dayes, forbidding the souldiers to fight at that time, to the intent he might fill the ditch more conveniently (for it is lawfull for the Jews onely to fight for their bodies upon the Sabbath.) At last when the ditch was filled, and the towers were built upon the rampire, he beat the wals with those engines which he brought from Tyre; but they were beaten back by those who resisted from the top of the wals, who darted divers stones at them. Against the violent power whereof, the towers that were builded in that quarter, being of a great and goodly building, resisted as valiantly, and as long as they possibly could. But the Romanes found but hard measure in this place, and Pompey admired the constancy of the Jews, who being amongst the thickest of their enemies darts, yet omitted not any ceremony: but (as though they had firme peace) they every day observed their ceremonies, offered sacrifices and offerings, and most diligently observed all honour and divine service: yea in the very taking of the place, although every day they were killed at the Altar, yet did they not cease from the lawfull rites of their religion. At last in the third moneth of the siege, whereas scarcely one tower was beaten down, they brake into the Temple, and the first that attempted to climbe over the wall, was Faustus Cornelius Silius sonne, and after him two Centurions, Furinus and Fabius with their regiments, who compassing the Temple about (while some sought to hide themselves, and other some resisted) they slew them all. There were many Priests also among the rest; who, although they saw the enemies with naked swords rushing upon them, yet being nothing at all dismayed thereat, continued still their sacrifices; and were slain even whilest they offered and incensed in the Temple: preferring the dutie they ought to religion, even before their own safetie. Many also were slain by their own countrey men that favoured the adverse part: and many cast themselves down headlong upon the rocks, other some in their fury having desperately fired all things upon the wals, burned themselves for company. So that there twelve thousand Jews were slain, but very few Romanes: yet many were hurt, and amongst all that massacre there was nothing so lamentable, as that the holy Sanctuary (which never any man saw before that time) was revealed to strangers. Finally, Pompeius accompanied with his followers, came into the Temple, where it was lawfull for none but the high Priest to come, and saw the candlesticks, lamps, table, censers, and all the golden vessels, and whatsoever was within the Temple. Moreover, he beheld the great quantitie of odoriferous drugs which were kept in store in that place, and two thousand talents of holy money: yet did he not take away these things, nor any thing else belonging to the Temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacristans to purge and make cleane the Temple, and to offer solemne sacrifice. He likewise proclaimed Hircanus high Priest (who had in all things shewed himself very forward, and especially at the time of the siege) as also for that he hindred a multitude of swaynes (who addressed for warre) from joyning themselves with Aristobulus: and therefore like a good Captain got the good will of the people more by love, then by feare.

Amongst others that were captives there was Aristobulus father in law; who was also his

And in favour of Demetrius of Gadara (a libertine of his) he reedified Gadara, which the tants, and made them under the rule of Syria. And of this place and Judæa, and of all places from the borders of Egypt unto Euphrates, he made Scaurus Governour, leaving him two legions of souldiers. Which done, he took his journey to Rome by Cilicia, leading Aristobulus and his family captives, who had two daughters and two sonnes, the elder whereof called Alexander, escaped in the way; as for the younger whose name was Antigonus, he with his sisters was carried to Rome.

much evill: For there arose a great famine in his army, notwithstanding that Hircannus by Antipaters means sent them victuals. Scaurus also sent the same Hircannus as his familiar friend unto Aretas, to perswade him that by disbursing some money, he should work his peace. Upon whose motion Aretas condescended and gave him three hundred talents, and so Scaurus with his army departed out of Arabia.

In the meane time Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus (who in the way to Rome escaped from Pompey) gathered together a great army, and desperately set upon Hircannus, wasting all Judæa, which he hoped quickly to winne, yea the wall which was destroyed by Pompey at Jerusalem, had been builded up again as he hoped, had not Gabinus (who was sent into Syria to succeed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before shewed his valour, at that time also with an army come against Alexander. Who fearing the worst, assembled all the forces that he could to make resistance, so that he had ten thousand footmen, and a thousand and five hundred horsemen: he fortified also the commodious places of the countrey, to wit, Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Machærun, which were neer unto the mountains of Arabia. Gabinus sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the army, and followed after with the rest; and certain chosen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Jews, whereof Malichus and Pistholus were made chief, joyned themselves with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinus with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

But Alexander perceiving himself unable to encounter with all their united forces, fled:
but drawing neer unto Jerusalem, he was constrained to hazard the fight, where losing to the number of six thousand (whereof some three thousand were taken alive, and other three thousand slain) he escaped with the rest. But Gabinus as soon as he came to the Castle called Alexandrium, understanding that many had forsaken their places, he by promising them pardon sought to unite them unto him before the warre began: but when he perceived that they hammered on no abject resolution, he slew the most of them; as for the rest he shut them up in the Castle. In this battell Captain Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renowne, and although he had alwaies and at all times shewed himself valiant, yet there especially his valour appeared. Gabinus leaving some to winne the Castle, went unto the Cities, and strengthened those that were not yet assaulted, and reedified those that were destroyed, and by his commandment Scythopolis and Samaria, and Anthedon, and Apollonia, and Jamnia, and Raphia, and Marisa, and Dora, and Gadara, and Azotus, and many more began to be inhabited, so that their inhabitants joyfully peopled and dwelt therein. Which when he had done, he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more urgent siege: whereat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, he sent Embassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon his

A his offences, promising to render unto him the castles of Macherunt and Hircanum, which were in his power, and besides them Alexandrium: All which Gabinus by counsell of Alexanders mother destroyed, lest they might be occasion of new warres. This woman accosted and flattered Gabinus, for that shee feared lest her husband and the rest of the captives at Rome should be any wayes damnified. After this, Gabinus carried Hircanus to Jerusalem: and committing the Temple unto his charge, he made others of the Nobilitie Rulers of the Common-wealth, and divided the whole nation of the Jews into five parts and governments, whereof one was established at Jerusalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Jericho, the fifth at Sephoris a Citie of Galilee: and the Jews being delivered from the government of one man only, willingly suffered themselves to be ruled by the Nobilitie. But shortly after, Aristobulus escaping from Rome raised new troubles: who gathering a great army partly of those that desired a change, partly of them that loved him before, took Alexandrium and began to compass it again with a wall: but hearing that Gabinus had sent Sisenna, Antonius, and Servilius against him with an army, he went to Macherunt, and forsaking those that were not fit for warre, he took with him almost 8000. armed men, amongst whom was Nicholam Governour of them that were revolted, who with 1000. men fled out of Jerusalem. But the Romanes followed and pursued them: and joyning battell with them, Aristobulus with his men fought valiantly, till being by force overcome, the Romanes slew five thousand of them, and almost two thousand fled into a mountaine, and the other thousand breaking the ranks of the Romanes with Aristobulus, were forced to Macherunt: where the King hiding himself the first night amongst the ruines, hoped that having respite, he might gather another army, and fortifie the castle: but having fortwo daies sustained the forces of the Romanes, although unable to doe it, at last was taken: and with his sonne Amigonius, who had been imprisoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinus, and from thence to Rome: and the Senate put him in prison: but his sonnes they sent into Judaea, because Gabinus writ that he had so promised Aristobulus his wife upon condition the castles might be yeilded. Now Gabinus being prepared to warre against the Parthians, Ptolomem hindered him, who returning from Euphrates went into Egypt, leaving Antipater and Hircanus his friends to dispose of all things belonging to the war: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corn, and men, and he perswaded the Jews who kept the wayes that lead unto Pelusium, to suffer Gabinus to passe. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinus there began a commotion, and Alexander Aristobulus sonne once more incited the Jews to rebellion, and having gathered a mighty power, purposed to destroy all the Romanes that were in that countrey: which Gabinus fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of these tumults) he sent Antipater before, who perswaded some of the rebels to be quiet, yet 30000. remained with Alexander. For which cause he was very forward to fight, and went out to battell: the Jews came against him, and neer unto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000. were slain, and the rest were put to flight: and Gabinus returned to Jerusalem through the counsell of Antipater: who having established that estate, went from thence and overcame the Nabathians in battell: he likewise permitted Mithridates and Orsanes privily to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, saying that they had escaped from the souldiers. In the meane time Crassus, who was appointed to be his successor, had Syria delivered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars took all the gold that was in the Temple of Jerusalem, and 2000. talents which Pompeius had forborn to do: who passing over Euphrates, was both himself and his whole army utterly overthrowen: of which thing it behooveth us not to speake in this place. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians endeavoured themselves to enter Syria, but Cassius who succeeded him in the government, repulsed them: and having gotten the upper hand he speedily resorted into Judaea, and taking Tarichea, he carried away about 3000. men captives, and put Pytholam to death, for gathering a company of seditious people unto Aristobulus his part. He that caused and counselled his death was Antipater, who was married unto a noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had foure sonnes, Phasalus and King Herod, Ioseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome, who sought the friendship of all Potentates round about him by courtesie and hospitalitie, and especially he got the good will of the King of Arabia by affinitie, unto whose fidelitie he committed his sonnes, because he had undertaken the wars against Aristobulus. But Cassius made a truce with Alexander, and in the meane time went to Euphrates to hinder the passage of the Parthians, of which we will speake hereafter.

CHAP. VII.

Of the death of ARISTOBULUS, and the warre between ANTIPATER
and MITHRIDATES.

After that Cæsar had forced the Senate and Pompey to flye beyond the Ionian sea, and by that means made himself sole Master of all at Rome, he set Aristobulus at liber-tie, and with two legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his means speedily to win both it and also all places adjoyning to Judæa: but both the hope of Cæsar and the forwardnesse of Aristobulus was overthrowne through envy: for he was poysoned by Pompeys favourites, and even in his own countrey his body lay unburied, which notwithstanding was preserved from putrefaction with honey, till such time as Antionus sent it unto the Jews, commanding them to bury it in the Kings sepulcher. His sonne Alexander also was beheaded at Antiochia by Scipio, being first according to the tenour of Pom-peys letters accused before the tribunall seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romanes, Ptolomeus the sonne of Minas, who ruled Chalcis which was under Libanus, having taken his brethren, sent his sonne Philippo with them to Ascalon; and he violently taking away Antigonus and his sisters from the wife of Aristobulus, brought them to his father, and falling in love with the youngest, took her to wife: for which cause he was afterward put to death by his father. For Ptolomeus having slain his sonne, married Alexandra, and for that affinitie sake, was more carefull for her brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater fought all means to get Cæsars favour: and when Mithridates of Pergamenus was hindred by the Garrison at Pelusium to passe any further with an army into Egypt, and was by that means stayed at Ascalon, he perswaded the Arabians to assist him, the rather, because he was but a stranger, and he himself also seconded him with almost three thousand armed Jews.

Moreover, he incited the Potentates of Syria, and Ptolomeus who inhabited Libanus, and Iamblicus and another Ptolomeus to assist him; for whose sakes the cities of that countrey did willingly undertake the wars. And now Mithridates strengthened by Antipaters means, came to Pelusium, and because they would not suffer him to passe, he besieged the citie, in which siege Antipater shewed his valour: for making a breach on that side of the wall, where his quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the citie, and so Pelusium was taken.
But the inhabitants of Onias countrey who were Egyptians and Jews, suffered him not to passe any further: yet did Antipater handle the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not onely suffer him to passe, but also provided victuals for his army. Whereupon the citie of Memphis would not fight, but yeelded of their own accord unto Mithridates: so that passing thorow Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians in a place called the tents of the Jews; and being with all his company in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the river side, set upon and discomfited the left wing of the enemies battell, and rushing upon them that pressed upon Mithridates, he slew many, and pursued the rest that fled, till he got their tents and all with the losse of fourescore men. But Mithridates flying, lost eight hundred men, and being against all hope preserved out of those wars, was without all envy a true witness before Cæsar of all that which Antipater had both done and deserved. Whereupon Cæsar redoubled his courage with praise and promises unto him, and made him forward to hazard himself for him. In a word, he proved and shewed himself a stout warrior, and having many wounds in every part of his body, he bare a badge and testimony of his valour and vertue. Afterward when the state of Egypt was quiet, he returned into Syria, where he made him a citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities thereof: and did so honour him in other things and use him so friendly, that he made him a pattern for all to imitate:
and for his sake confirmed Hircanus in the high priesthood.

CHAP. VIII.

How ANTIPATER was accused before CÆSAR: of the Priesthood of HIRCANUS and how HEROD made warre.

At the sametime Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus repairing to Cæsar, against his will was a cause of Antipaters greater felicitie: for coming to complaine of his fathers death (who was as it was thought through Pompeys envy poysoned) and to accuse Scipio of crueltie which was used against his brother; whereas he should have abandoned all passion which moved him to mingle hatred with his miseries, contrariwise he accused Hircanus and Antipater as though they had unjustly driven him

A him and his brethren out of their native soile, and grievously injured the people, to obtain their intent, alleading that they had sent aide into Egypt to Caesar's forces, not for good will, but for feare of ancient enmitie, and that hereby they might acquit themselves of the good will they bare to Pompey. At these words Antipater (casting away his vesture) shewed the number of his wounds, saying, it was not needfull to use words to prove what affection he had borne to Caesar; for his very body would shew it, although he himself held his peace: adding, that he admired the impudent boldnesse of Antigonius, who being sonne to an enemy of the Romanes, and a fugitive from the Romanes, and still continued his fathers purpose of noveltie and sedition, should dare to accuse others before the Roman Emperor, demanding of him how he durst hope to obtain any good thing, who ought to be contented with his life onely: alleading, that he craved not maintenance for that he wanted; but that he might raise a rebellion amongst the Jews, and against them who should bestow any thing upon him.

Which when Caesar heard, he said that Hircanus was most worthy to be high Priest, and bad Antipater with what dignitie he would have: who leaving that to the pleasure of the giver, he was made Governour of all Judaea. And moreover, he obtained to reedifie the razed walls of his countrey, and Caesar commanded that those honours should be engraven in the Capitoll, that it might be a token in time to come of Antipater's justice and vertue. Antipater having attended Caesar out of Syria, first of all repaired the ruined walls of his countrey which Pompey had razed: and going thorowout all the countrey, he threatened the obstinate, and perswaded the seditious to obedience, admonishing them, that if they obeyed Hircanus, they might live in wealth and peace, and enjoy happinesse and an universall felicitie: but if they suffered themselves to be led with the vain hopes of those, who for their private commodities sought for alteration, that then they should finde him in stead of a Procurator, the Lord of all, and Hircanus in stead of a King, a Tyrant, and the Romanes and Caesar, in stead of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not suffer his power to be overthrowen, whom they themselves had established for King. But notwithstanding he spake these words, yet (because he saw Hircanus more dull, and not of so fervent a spirit as the case of a Kingdome required) he himself settled the estate of the countrey, and made Phasalus his eldest sonne Governour of the army, and the Lord of Jerusalem and of his own living, and sent Herod his youngest sonne to governe Galilee (although he was very young:) who being by nature of a valiant courage, found out a present occasion to shew his brave minde: for he took Ezechias which was captain of thieves, who as he understood was wont to prey upon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other thieves: which thing was so gratefull unto the Syrians, that in all townes and villages they made songs of Herod, as though he had restored them to peace, and to their possessions.

At length, the glory of this fact came to the eares of Sextus Caesar, who was Caesar the Emperours kinsman, who then ruled Syria. Phasalus also did strive to overcome the towardnesse and good reputation of his brother, by daily increasing and winning to himself the good wils of the inhabitants of Jerusalem: so that during the time he governed the Citie, he did nothing insolently through might or power: for which cause the people honoured Antipater as their King, and revered him as Lord of all, yet was his fidelitie and good will never the lesse towards Hircanus. But it is impossible that any man that liveth in prosperitie should not be envied. For Hircanus, although beforetime he were moved something at the glory of these young men, and especially with the prosperous successe of Herod, being often annoyed with frequent messengers, who spred his praise for every thing he did: yet in particular he was stirred up by many envious persons, who are wont to haunt the Courts of Princes, who were grieved that Antipater and his sonnes ruled without offence. These men told Hircanus that he onely enjoyed the bare name of a King, and that Antipater and his sonnes ruled all, and that he so long would permit to wink at them, till that at the last they would make themselves Kings, for they now did no more such as pretend themselves to be Procurators. But leaving that title, they took upon them the dignities of Lords and Masters, without any regard or reverence towards him, for Herod had put to death a great multitude of Jews against the law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the King had given him any such authoritie: and that Herod, if he were not a King, but a private person, was to be brought into judgement, there to answer the matter, and shew the King a reason, and satisfie the laws of his countrey, which permitted no man to be put to death before by law he was convicted. By these perswasions Hircanus grew angry: so that not concealing his wrath, he caused Herod to be sent for to answer the matter: who both for that his father advertised him thereto: and because he trusted to the equitie of his cause, first leaving a Garrison in Galilee, he repaired unto the King, and came accompanied with a strong guard, lest either he should seeme to derogate from Hircanus dignitie, if he should lead forth many, or that for want of defence, he should expose himself to the envy of his adversaries. Sextus Caesar also fearing the young man lest any evil should betide him amongst his enemies, sent unto Hircanus, manifestly warning him to free Herod from the crime of murder. For which cause

Hircanus who loved Herod, and was willing so to do of his own accord, did acquit him.
Whereupon, he supposing that he had escaped against the Kings will, went to Damascus unto Sextus, purposing not to obey, if hereafter he were sent for. Nathelesse, Hircanus was once again incited by bad people against Herod, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterprize something against him: which Hircanus believing, knew not what to do, seeing his enemy more potent then himself.

Shortly after, Sextus Caesar proclaimed him Generall of the army, both in Syria and Samaria: so that now he was greatly to be feared, not only for that he was highly in favour with the commonaltie, but also for the forces which he commanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fell into an extreame feare, verily perswading himself that Herod with his whole army would presently come against him. Neither was his suspicion in vain: for Herod angry at the pretended crime whereof he was accused, came with a great army to Jerusalem, intending to depose Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his father and brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating that he would account that terror (wherein he had put his enemies) and his own indignation for a sufficient revenge, and that he should spare the King, by whose favour he came to be so potent: adding moreover, that he should not thinke it a disdain that he was called to answer his accusations; but seeing that he was acquitted of them, he should shew himself gratefull to the King. Neither ought he to revenge the discontent he had taken, that he should shew himself unthankfull to him who had saved his life.
Moreover, he was to consider the fortune of warres, together with the cause thereof, and thinke that the warres he now pretended, were very unjust, bidding him not to be too confident of the victory, being to fight against his own King, who had alwaies been gracious unto him, and never cruell; onely being as it were urged thereunto by some of his counsell, who being merely envious, rather to satisfie their own dislikes, then in regard of his disgraces, framed a shadow of an accusation. Herod pacified herewith, supposed it to be sufficient for him to obtaine the thing he hoped for, to have shewed his forces unto his nation.

At this time began civill war among the Romanes neer unto Apamia: for Cassius Bassus, for the love he bare to Sextus Pompey, slew Sextus Caesar at unawares, and made himself Governour of his army: and other Captains of Caesars, to revenge his death, made after Bassus with all their forces, unto whom Antipater by his two sons sent aide both for Caesars sake that was slain, as for Caesars sake that was yet alive: for he was an entire friend and well-willer unto them both, and these warres continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to succed Sextus.

CHAP. IX.

Of the dissension among the Romanes after CAESAR'S death, and of the treachery of MALICHUS.

At this time arose great and bloody civill wars amongst the Romanes, at such time as Caesar was traiterously slain by the treason of Cassius and Brutus, after he had ruled the Empire three yeeres and seven moneths. By reason of which murder their troubles daily increased, and the nobilitie being at variance amongst themselves, every one followed that course, that they thought most expedient for themselves. Whereupon Cassius presently marched into Syria, to take possession of the government of the army which was about Apamia, where he made Marcus and the legions that were at variance, and Bassus friends: and raising the siege from Apamia, and leading the army in his own person, he forced every citie to be tributary: so that he grew to exact without measure. Whereas therefore he commanded the Jews to contribute seven hundred talents, Antipater, who feared his displeasure, appointed his sonnes, and other of his friends presently to gather the mony, and especially among the rest he gave this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, being by necessity enforced thereunto. But Herod first of all got Cassius his favour, who brought a hundred talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part of Province: for this cause Cassius accounted him as a deare friend. As for the rest, he accused them of negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: so that for that cause he destroyed Gophna and Ammanthes, and other two of the basest cities, marching onward as if he intended to kill Malichus, for that he had been so carelesse and negligent in gathering the tribute

A tribute money. But Antipater (presently disbursing unto Cassius a hundred talents) saved both him and all the rest of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Cassius was departed, did no more remember how beneficiall Antipater had been unto him, but oftentimes did treacherously lye in wait for to murder Antipater, who hindred and withstood his villanous pretence; notwithstanding that himself had often confessed that Antipater had saved his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and subtiltie, passed over the river Jordan to gather an army that he might revenge those treacheries. But Malichus being discovered, by his impudency overcame Antipater's sonnes: for through many oathes and excuses, he won Phasalus chief of the garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod also who was master of the armory, that they should be a means to reconcile him to Antipater. Whereupon, Antipater intreating Marcus (who was Generall of the army in Syria, and had determined to kill him he was saved. The reason that Marcus would have put him to death, was because Malichus sought to make an alteration.

Now Cesar being young, and Antonius warring against Cassius and Brutus; Brutus and Cassius having gathered an army in Syria; in consideration that Herod had stood them in stead where need required, they made him Procurator of all Syria; giving him a band of horsemen and footmen. Moreover, Cassius promised him that if the warres had a happy end, he would make him King of Judea. But it so came to passe, that the power and expectation which all men had of Herod, was the cause of Antipater's fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in feare, hired one of the Kings officers for a certain sum of money to poison Antipater, by which means he dyed, being thus unjustly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to govern, who had recovered the kingdome being

C lost, for Hircanus. Malichus (perceiving that the people was incensed against him, because they suspected that he had poisoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their displeasure by denying the fact; yet to the intent he might be stronger, he gathered about him a guard of armed men: for he thought that Herod would not let the matter slip so, but that he would presently come with an army to revenge his fathers death. But by the counsell of his brother Phasalus (who sent him word that he should not openly be revenged upon Malichus, lest a sedition might arise among the people) he patiently permitted it so to be, and suffered Malichus to purge himself, and permitted him to be freed from suspicion, and celebrated a most solemn funerall for his father: which done, he went unto Samaria, and appeased the sedition, wherewithall the Citie was disquieted. After this, he returned to Jerusalem, intending in that place to celebrate the festivitie, sending certain of his armed men before him, and appointing the rest to accompany him. But Malichus, who feared this approach of his, had solicited Hircanus to give order, that no strangers should intermingle themselves among the people who were at that time purified.

But Herod, contemning both him that commanded, and his commission, entred the Citie by night: whereupon Malichus once more came unto him, and wept for Antipater. Herod, although he could very hardly bridle his displeasure, yet dissembled he the same: and sent letters unto Cassius, wherein he complained of his fathers death: the memory of whose hate being refreshed by this offence, he writ again unto Herod, willing him to revenge his fathers death; which that he might the better effect, he secretly commanded the Captains of

E his Regiment that they should assist Herod. Now for that after the surprizall of Laodicea, all the best of the Citie came to Herod, bringing gifts and crowns, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended revenge. Now Malichus, suspecting that Herod would work revenge at Tyre, purposed secretly to get away his sonne, who was there a pledge, and he himself purposed to flye into Judea: But despaire of his own safetie urged him to greater matters; for he hoped to incite the Jews to take arms against the Romanes, for that Cassius was now busie in the warres against Antonius: so that he thought he might easily depose Hircanus, and so make himself King. But he was prevented by the destinies: for Herod suspecting his purpose, invited him and Hircanus to supper: at which time he made a shew as though he had sent one of his servants, to cause a banquet to be prepared, but indeed he sent him to the Captains to foretell them that they might lye in wait for Malichus: who remembering what charge Cassius gave them, came forth of the Citie unto the shore next adjoyning unto the town, all armed with swords; where compassing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat astonished, fell in a swoone, and being scarcely come to himself, he demanded who killed Malichus? One of the Captains answered, that Cassius gave that commandment: whereupon he answered, Truly Cassius hath preserved me and my countrey, in killing him who was a traitor to us both: but whether herein he spake as he thought, or that for feare he approved the fact, it is uncertain. And thus was Herod revenged upon Malichus.

After Cassius was departed from Syria, there arose another sedition among them in Jerusalem: for Felix came with an armie against Phasaelus, thinking to be revenged upon Herod for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod at that time was at Damascus with Fabius a Romane Captaine, who comming to assist Phasaelus, by the way fell sicke; so that he could not succour him: but it so fell out, that Phasaelus without any help, did of himself overcome Felix, and therewithall reproved Hircanus as ungratefull, who had both favoured Felix, and suffered Malichus his brother to take and keep his castles (for already had he seized many of them, and especially one of greatest strength called Massada) yet all these did not protect him from the violence of Herod, who was no sooner recovered of his sicknesse, but presently he took all the rest, and Massada: and at Hircanus humble sute, permitted him to depart from thence. He also chased Marion the tyrant of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who occupied three Castles in that countrey: as for all the Tyrians that he took, he spared their lives, & sent some away with rewards; whereby he got the good will of the citie, and the hatred of the Tyrant. This Marion was made Tyrant of Tyria by Cassius, who through the means of such like instruments had gotten into his hand all Syria: and Marion for the hatred he bare to Herod, took with him Antigonus, Aristobulus his son: and by Fabius his means, whom Antigonus had gained unto himself for money, he also got Ptolemæus to assist him in this expedition. Now Ptolemæus, who was father in law to Antigonus, furnished him with all necessaries: Herod likewise preparing himself against them, gave them battell in the entrance into Judæa, and got the victory: and having put Antigonus to flight, he returned into Jerusalem, where he was honoured by all men for his desert in that victory, so that even they that before despised him, by reason of his affinity newly contracted with Hircanus, sought his friendship and familiaritie. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of that countrey, named Doris, and had by her a son named Antipater: but he then married Mariamne, Alexanders daughter, who was Aristobulus his sonne, and Hircanus his neece, by reason whereof he came to be familiar with the King. But when Cassius was slain neer unto Philippi, Cesar departed into Italy, and Antonius into Asia: at which time the chief of the Jews came and accused Phasaelus and Herod, alledging that they by force got unto themselves the rule and disposition of the countrey, and left Hircanus onely the bare name of a King. But Herod being then present, so won and wrought himself into Antonius favour by a great sum of money, that he permitted not his enemies to speak one word more, who thereupon returned home. Afterward, a hundred men of the most honourable amongst the Jews, repaired to Daphne neer Antiochia unto Antonius (now doting on the love of Cleopatra) who being chosen from amongst the rest, because of their eloquence and nobilitie of birth, propounded an accusation against the two brethren. Messala presented himself to return them answer, being assisted by Hircanus by reason of the affinity that was between him and Herod. Antonius having heard both parties, demanded of Hircanus whom he thought to be the fittest to govern their Common-wealth? who answered, Herod and his brethren. Whereat Antonius was exceeding glad (for he had been their fathers guest, and was most courteously entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinus into Judæa) and thereupon he made them both Tetrarchs, leaving unto them the rule of all Judæa: which when the Jews Embassadors misliked, he took 17 of them and put them in prison, where he almost killed them, and rejected and derided the rest: whereupon there arose greater tumults amongst them in Jerusalem. At last the Jews sent another Embassage of a thousand men unto Tyre, where Antonius sojourned with an intent to come to Jerusalem with violence: Antonius hearing their exclames, sent out the Magistrates of Tyre against them, commanding them to kill all they could catch of the Jews, charging them also to confirme their authority, whom he himself had constituted Tetrarchs. But Herod and Hircanus went before them toward the Sea shore, admonishing them earnestly to be contented, lest they by this their indiscreet proceeding should become not onely the cause of their own deaths, but also of war against their own countrey: but for that they would not be reclaimed by these admonitions, Antonius sent out certain armed men, who killed many of them, and wounded the rest. Hircanus after this dysaster both caused the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured: notwithstanding all this, they that escaped would not contain themselves in peace, but they so troubled the citie, that Antonius in his displeasure slew those that he had in hold.

Of the warre of the Parthians against the Jews: of the flight of Herod and his fortune.

Two yeers after this, Barzapharnes Governour of the Parthians, accompanied with Pacorus the Kings sonne, seized upon Syria, and Lysanias who succeeded his father Ptolemæus, sonne of Minæus, promising a thousand talents and five hundred women, perswaded him to put Antigonus in possession of the kingdome of Judea, and depose Hircanus. Pacorus induced by these promises, went himself along the Sea coast, giving commandment to Barzapharnes to passe thorow the midst of the countrey; but amongst the rest of the places bordering on the Sea, the Tyrians would not receive Pacorus (notwithstanding that the Citizens of Ptolemæis and Sidon had given him entertainment) wherefore he gave part of his horsemen unto one who was the Kings Butler, called Pacorus, as himself was, commanding him to passe into Judæa, and learn what their enemies meant to doe, and to help Antigonus where need required. Who as they wasted the countrey about Carmelus, many Jews came of their own accord and joyned with Antigonus, shewing themselves very prompt to fight: for which cause he sent them before to take a place called Drymos, where having fought with his enemies and put them to flight, he pursued them with all speed as farre as Jerusalem: and his number being augmented, he came unto the Kings house. But Hircanus and Phasaelus met them with a strong company, and fought with them in the market place: where the enemies were forced to flye, and part of them were by Herod shut up in the Temple; and he appointed sixtie men to keep them, which he placed in the houses next adjoyning; but the people bearing a grudge to his two brethren, burnt them with fire: whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were consumed with fire) set upon the people, and killed a great many of them, and every houre one laid wait for another: so that every day some was murdered. Now the feast of Pentecost drawing nigh, all places about the Temple, and all the whole citie was filled with people of the countrey, whereof the most part was armed, and Phasaelus kept the walles, and Herod with a small company kept the Kings palace, who assaulting their enemies upon a sudden as they were in the suburbs, kild a great many of them, and put all the rest to flight: part of them he couped up in the citie, others he shut in the Temple, and the rest between the uttermost Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requested that Pacorus might come and conclude a peace betwixt them. Phasaelus moved by these his prayers, received the Parthian into the Citie, and entertained him into his house, accompanied with five hundred horsemen, who came under a pretence to make peace, but in effect he resorted thither to help Antigonus: he craftily conspiring against Phasaelus, perswaded him to repaire unto Barzapharnes as an Embassador to treat a peace, notwithstanding that Herod altogether dissuaded him, willing him to kill the Traitor, and not to trust his subtiltie: adding that the Parthians were naturally unfaithfull.

Pacorus departing out of the citie, tooke Hircanus with him that he might be the lesse suspected, and leaving some horsemen with Herod named * Eleutheri, he followed Phasaelus with the rest. When they came neere unto Galilee, they found the inhabitants at variance and up in armes, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily with pretence of courtesie and friendship hid his treachery) who after he had bestowed gifts upon them, and that they were retired, laid an ambush for them: whereof they had intelligence at such time as they came to a place of the Sea-coast named Bodippon. For in this place they understood of the thousand talents that were promised, and how that Antigonus had given the Parthians more then five hundred women of those that were amongst them, and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and that they had been lately taken, but that delay was made till such time as Herod was surprized in Jerusalem, for feare left he hearing what was become of them; might provide for himself. Now they might perceive that these were not only words: for they might behold their Keepers not farre off, yet would not Phasaelus forsake Hircanus, notwithstanding that Offilius often exhorted him to flye (unto whom Saramalla the richest among the Syrians had declared all the plat-forme of their treason:) but he chose rather to goe unto Barzapharnes, and to upbraid him to his face that he had treacherously laid wait for him: but especially for that in regard of money he had suffered himself to be corrupted, whereas he himself would have given more for his life and libertie, then Antigonus had done for the kingdome. At these words the Parthian with oathes and protestations craftily freed himself from suspicion, and no sooner repaired he to Pacorus; but presently the Parthians, thians, who stayed behinde, and had charge so to doe, laid hands on Phasaelus and Hircanus, G who openly exclaimed against their false hood and perjury.

In the meane time a Butler was sent out for that purpose, who sought to surprize Herod, and by some stratagem to coule him out of the Citie, who wrought by all the meanes he could, according as he was instructed. But Herod, who was alwaies wont to mistrust the perfidious practices of barbarous nations, being certain that those letters which discovered the treasons, were false into the enemies hands, would not goe forth, though Pacorus pretended a just cause, inciting him to ride out and meet them that brought the letters: wherein was contained neither the taking of Phasaelus, nor the treasons, but onely what Phasaelus had done. But long before this, Herod by others understood, that his brother Phasaelus was taken, and Mariamne a very wise woman, Hircanus daughter, with many intreaties perswaded Herod not to go forth: but that he should beware how he trusted himself to the mercy of that barbarous people, who did now as it were openly assault him. Whilest Pacorus was confuring with his accomplices how hee might privily effect his treasons, (seeing it was not possible openly to circumvent a man of so great wisdom) Herod in the night time, whilest his enemies neither knew nor suspected his intent, took his neereft kinsfolk and fled into Idumaea: which being once known, the Parthians followed him. For which cause, he made his mother, his brethren, and the young maiden despoised, and her mother and youngest brother to keepe on their journey, and he with his servants warily assaulted the Parthians, and having in every assault killed a great number of them, he halted towards the Castle of Massada, and in his retreat sustained more harme by the Jews, then by the Parthians: who as they had been alwaies troublesome, so now some threescore furlongs from the towne, set upon him, where Herod obtaining the victory, killed a great many of them, and in remembrance of that valiant act, he builded upon that place a most rich palace for the King, and erected there a most strong tower, which by his own name he called Herodium. And when he fled, many joyned with him: but when he came to Thersa, a town of Idumaea, his brother Ioseph met him, and perswaded him to lessen the number of his followers: for Massada would not receive such a multitude (for the number of the multitude was above nine thousand): for which cause Herod according to his counsell dismissed those that were unfit for his turne, and sent them into Idumaea, giving them necessaries for their journey. As for those that were chosen men and fit for his purpose, he retained them with him, and so was he received into the Castle: where leaving eight hundred souldiers to defend the women, and provision sufficient for those that were within, he himself went unto Petra, a citie of Arabia.

Now the Parthians at Jerusalem began to sack the houses of them that were fled, and the Kings palace: they onely abstained from Hircanus money, which did amount to more then three hundred talents: as for other mens goods they found not so much as they expected; for Herod long before that time suspecting the infidelitie of the Parthians, had carried all his riches and jewels into Idumaea, and every one of his followers did the like. When the Parthians had taken the spoile, they were so impious that they left no place of the whole countrey free from their tyrannous warre. They destroyed the citie of Marfa also, and bound Phasaelus and Hircanus, and delivered them to Antigonus to be scourged, who presently with his teeth bit off Hircanus eares, to the end that if by some alteration he chanced hereafter to get loose, he might be no more high Priest: for none might offer sacrifice that wanted any member of his body. But Phasaelus his fortitude prevented the cruelty of Antigonus, who having neither weapon nor his hands at libertie, beat out his own braines against a stone and dyed, demonstrating himself by that act, to be the true brother of Herod, and that Hircanus had degenerated: he dyed manfully by a worthy death, and answerable to so famous a life. Yet some reported that he recovered after that hurt, and that Antigonus sent a Chirurgion under pretence to cure the wound, who filled the same with venomous medicines, and so killed him. Well, be it as it was, it was in him a gallant resolution.

It is reported likewise, that understanding before his death by the meanes of a certaine woman that Herod was escaped, he spake these words: Now I shall die with a courage, who leave behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies, and so he dyed. Although the Parthians had not yet received the women (which was the chiefe thing they lookt for) yet leaving them, they established Antigonus in Jerusalem, and led Hircanus prisoner into Parthia. But Herod with all speed halted into Arabia, as if his brother had been yet alive, to the intent he might borrow money of the King of Arabia, wherewith onely he hoped that the cruelty of those barbarous Parthians might be mitigated towards Phasaelus: for his opinion was that although the Arabian had now forgot his fathers friendship, and were hard hearted, yet at least he would lend him money, seeing it was to redeeme his brother, whose sonne

A sonne he meant to leave in pawn for it. For Herod took with him a sonne of his brothers into Arabia that was seven yeers old, and purposed to have given three hundreth talents for his ransome, and had made the Tyrians intercessors for him to the Parthians: but fortune prevented his endeavours, so that his love and care for his brother prevailed nothing. He found also that the Arabians had now cast away the league of amitie: for Malichus their King sent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all speed to depart out of his dominions, framing an excuse that the Parthians had sent Embassadors unto him, to request him to drive him out of his countrey; but indeed the cause was, that he would not repay that which Antipater had deserved, nor recompence his sons now comfortlesse, for those good turns that he had received at their fathers hands: and those who counselled him to this, were such as offered to forswear those summes, which Antipater had put them in trust with, who were the chiefeest men about him. For which cause, Herod perceiving the Arabians to be his foes, for that which he thought would have procured him friendship, answered the messenger according as grieve moved him, and took his journey towards Egypt: and the first night he lodged in a countrey temple, to the intent that those of his company that were behinde him might overtake him. The next day coming to Rhinocolura, his brothers death was told him; where, after he had there mourned his fill, he went forward.

The year of the world, 3933.

Herod perceiveth the Arabians to be his enemies.

Now the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himself of that which he had done to Herod, and sent speedy messengers after him, to will him to return, repenting himselfe that he had so injuriously intreated him. When Herod was come to Pelusium, the watchmen of the citie would not permit him to passe: for which cause he himself in person went to the governors, who reverencing the fame and dignitie of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no sooner resorted, but Cleopatra received him very honourably, intending to make him the Generall of her army which she was preparing at that present. But he neither regarding the offers and request of the Queen, nor yet discouraged by the hard winter season, nor the dangers of the Seas, took his journey towards Rome; and being in great danger of shipwrack neer unto Pamphilia, both he and the rest of the passengers were enforced to cast away the most part of their loading: with much adoe he arrived safe at Rhodes, which had been fore molested by Cassius wars; there was he entertained by certain of his friends, Ptolomeus and Saphinius; and although his money grew scant, yet there he builded a great galley with three ranks of oars, and in it (being accompanied with his friends) he sailed to Brundisium, and from thence went presently to Rome. Where first of all (in regard of familiarity between his father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring unto him both his own calamitie, and the miserable desolation of the whole countrey: and how leaving his dearest friends besieged in a Castle, himselfe in humble maner through the stormy winter seas was come unto him, humbly craving succour at his hands. Whereupon Antonius compassionating his calamity, and remembring his familiaritie with Antipater, and contemplating the vertue of Herod who stood before him, determined upon the present to make him King of the Jews, whom before he himselfe had made Tetrarch: for he loved not Herod so well, but he hated Antigonius as much: for he held him both for a seditious person, and for an enemy to the Romanes. Now to the accomplishing of this, he found Caesar farre more ready then himselfe, who called to minde the service that Antipater did in Egypt under his father, and his entertainment and friendship in all things: and beside all these, he was wrought and wonne by Herods courage and valour. For which cause, he procured the Senate to be assembled; at which time Messala, and after him Aratius in the presence of Herod recounted his fathers deserts and fidelitie towards the Romanes, declaring Antigonius to be an enemy; not onely because that not long before he had revolted, but for that now lastly in despite of the Romanes he had by the assistance of the Parthians usurped the Kingdome. Upon which considerations the Senate being moved, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Romane warres, that Herod should be created King; the whole Senate condescended: and after the Senate was dismissed, Antonius and Caesar went forth with Herod between them, and the Consuls went before accompanied with other Magistrates to offer sacrifice, and to register the decree of the Senate in the Capitoll. And Antonius feasted Herod the first day of his reign.

Of Herods warre after he returned from Rome to recover Ierusalem, and against the theeves.

This time Antigonus besieged those that were left in the Castle of Massada, who had great store of victuals, and wanted nothing but water. For which cause Josephus Herods brother purposed to flie unto the Arabians with two hundred of his dearest friends, for that he had intelligence that Malichus repented him that he had given Herod no better entertainment. Yea he had forsaken the Castle, had not great store of rain falne that very night, wherein he intended to flie: for the wells and cisterns being now filled with water, there was no cause to flie: so that voluntarily issuing out of the Castle, he assaulted Antigonus souldiers, and killed very many of them, sometime in open warre, and sometime by policy: yet fought they not alwaies with fortunate successe, but returned sometimes with losse. In the mean time, Ventidius (who was Generall of that Romane army which was sent to expulse the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulsed them, resorted into Judæa, under pretence to succour Joseph and the rest that were besieged, but in effect to get Antigonus money. When as therefore he drew neer unto Ierusalem and had received the money he looked for, he departed with the greatest part of his army, leaving Silo behinde him with a few to colour his pretence: and Antigonus hoping for a second supply from the Parthians, fee'd Silo not to molest him for the present, seeing he was in great possibility. By this time Herod having sayled from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great army of Istra- gers and his own countrey men together, came into Galilee against Antigonus, being assisted with the forces of Ventidius and Silo, whom Delim who was sent from Antonius, perswaded to establish Herod in his kingdome. But Ventidius was busie in appeasing the broyles that the Parthians had made in the cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: yet did not Herod want aide, for every day the further he marched into the countrey, the more his army increased, for all Galilee (a very few excepted) yeelded unto him. Whereupon he purposed first of all to goe to Massada, to deliver his friends that were there besieged, but Joppe hindered his purpose; which for that it was an enemy town, he thought it best to take it before he went further, lest that whilest he was going to Ierusalem, his enemies should have a place behinde him to flie unto. Now Silo joynd armies with Herod, rejoycing that he had found occasion to resist, because he was persecuted by the Jews; whom Herod with a loose wing of his army and a small company of men, terrified, and presently put to flight, and saved Silo also who had much adoe to make resistance against them. This done and Joppe taken, he hastned to Massada, and the people of the countrey (some of them for his fathers sake, other- some for his own, and many for both) joynd themselves unto him: and many also came unto him for hope, because he was now King; so that now he had a very puissant army: but Antigonus hindered his journey, by planting certain ambushes in places convenient where Herod was to passe, and yet for all this he little harmed him.

Herod having easily taken Massada, and rescued his friends from thence, he went to Ierusalem; where both Siloes souldiers, and many of the Citie came and followed him, being now terrified with the greatnesse of his forces: there pitching their tents at the West side of the Town, they that guarded that part assaulted them with darts and arrowes; and others issuing by troups forth of the Citie, assaulted the forefront of the army. Whereupon Herod caused one to goe about the wals of the City, and to proclaime how that he was come for the good of the whole Citie, and that he would not take revenge of any, though he were his open enemy, and that he would pardon even them that had been most seditious. But when Antigonus his followers with loud exclamations hindered the criers voice from being heard, lest any man should alter his minde: Herod presently commaunded his men to beat the enemies off from the wall, who with their arrows speedily forced all that were in the towers to flie. At this time Silo was detected to have been hired with money: for he solicited many souldiers to cry out, that they wanted all things; and to aske money and victuals, and to crave to be dismissed and sent into some place of opportunitie, there to abide during the winter, nay he himselfe sought to be gone. But Herod went unto the Captains that served under Silo, and called many of the Souldiers together, requesting them not to forsake him at that exigent, whom Cesar, Antonius, and the whole Senate as they knew had sent thither, promising them that within one day he would relieve all their necessities. When he had thus entreated them, himselfe went about the fields, and brought them so much provision that

A that he cut off all Siloes excuses: and forecasting left hereafter there should be any want, he sent letters to Samaria (for that Citie about this time had rendred it selfe unto him) willing them to bring victuals, and wine and oyle, and cattell unto Jericho. Antigonus hearing this, presently sent certain of his men to lie in ambush in the fields, and suddenly to set upon those that came for provision, and kill them, and so hinder them from carrying any victuals to the campe: who obeying his commandement, went with a great number of souldiers to Jericho, and placed themselves upon the mountains, with an intent to espie if any body carried provision to the army. In the meantime Herod rested not; for taking with him ten companies (five of the Romanes, and five of the Jews, amongst whom were mixed three hundred that were hired, and besides them a few horsemen) he came to Jericho, where he found the citie without inhabitants, and 500. with their wives and families had placed themselves upon the tops of the mountains; whom when he had surprized, he permitted them to depart. But the Romanes brake into the citie, and sacked it, where they found the houses stored with all maner of riches: and the King leaving a garrison at Jericho, returned. He sent likewise the Romane souldiers to the cities which were on his side, to wit, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria, that they might abide there till winter was past. Antigonus also through Silo his means (whom he by money had made his friend) obtained that a part of his army might (during the winter time) abide at Lydda, for Antonius sake: and the Romanes being now discharged from the warres, abounded in all things.

All this time Herod was not idle, for accompanied with two thousand footmen, and five hundred horse, he went about Idumæa, and sent also his brother Ioseph, left by Antigonus his means the people should rebell. And he himselfe having carried his mother and the rest of his kindred, whom he took from Massada, into Samaria; and having placed them where no danger might betide them; himselfe went into Galilee, to subdue that part of the countrey, which as yet was not in his hands, and to expell from thence the garrisons left by Antigonus. And when he was come to Sephoris, notwithstanding it slew mightily, he easily took it; for the garrison before he assaulted it fled; and finding there great store of provision, he refreshed his souldiers, which now with winter weather were sore tyred, and then sent them against the thieves, that lay lurking in dens and caves, who making often incursions upon the countrey, molested the inhabitants no lesse then if they had been an army of enemies. And sending before three companies of footmen, and one troupe of horsemen, into a village called Arbela, himselfe fourty daies after came thither with the whole army. For all this the thieves feared him not, but arming themselves, came to meet him, trusting to their experience in warlike affairs, and their own desperate courage; and joyning battell, the right wing of their battell put the left wing of Herods to flight: but he with his right wing presently succoured them, and recalled his men that fled; and rushing violently upon his enemies, he a little asswaged the forces of the enemy, till at last the forefront of their battell, not able to stand any longer, fled. Herod pursued them even unto Jordan, and killed many of them; those that escaped fled over the river; and thus he freed Galilee from that feare, save that yet he had left some lurking in the caves, and therefore he was constrained there to make a longer abode. Wherefore first of all he gave the souldiers the fruit of their labours, and distributed to overy one of them an hundred and fifty drachmes of silver, and unto the Captains more, and so sent them where they should passe the winter. Also he writ unto his youngest brother Pheroras to provide necessaries for them in the market; and to build a wall about the Castle of Alexandrium: which he performed.

In the mean-while Antonius passed the time about Athens, and Ventidius sent for Silo and Herod to assist him in the war against the Parthians, charging them, that before their coming they should settle the estate of the Jews. Now Herod gladly and willingly sent Silo unto Ventidius: and in the mean time he with his army went against the thieves in the caves. These caves were in very steep mountains, so that there was no way to come unto them, save only by crooked and very narrow passages: and these mountains were all rocks of stone cleane throughout, hanging over the vallies; so that the King a great while was doubtfull what to doe, seeing the place was so difficult to come to. At last, Herod devised a way scarcely heard of before; for he put the valiantest of all his men into coffers, and so let them down into the edge of the caves, and they killed the thieves and their families, and cast fire at them that resisted. And Herod seeking to save some of them, caused a cryer to bid them come unto him: but there was not one that willingly came unto him, and those that were forced chose rather to die, then be his captives. So that an old man having seven sonnes and a wife, who all requested that they might goe forth to the King, and save their lives, killed them all af-

And Herod being in a place where he might behold this spectacle, being mooved with compassion, stretched forth his hand and requested him to spare his children: but he being nothing moved to compassion by Herods words, upbraided Herods base minde: and having butchered his sonnes, he also killed his wife, and casting the dead bodies down into the vallies, finally he cast himselfe likewise down headlong.

Herod having thus taken the caves, and slain those that were in them, leaving a part of his army, so much as he thought might suffice to repress any that should attempt any rebellion, and making Ptolomaeus chief over that part; returned into Samaria, carrying with him three thousand footmen, and fixe hundredth horsemen against Antigonus. After whose departure those that were accustomed to trouble Galilee, and molested it, having now (as they thought) opportunitie, assaulted Ptolomaeus at unawares and killed him: and wasted the countrey, retreating themselves into marsh grounds and secret places. Which when Herod understood, he presently came to succour the countrey, and killed the most part of the enemies, and having taken all the castles by force, he exacted a hundredth talents for recompence of that revolt to be paid by the cities. Now the Parthians being put to flight, and Pacorus slain, Ventidius being willed thereto by letters from Antonius, sent unto Herod a thousand horsemen, and two legions of footmen to assist him against Antigonus. Now Antigonus writ letters to the Generall of the foresaid company named Machara, desiring him to help him; and complaining that Herod injured him, promised him a summe of money. But he thinking it not best to forsake him he was sent to succour, especially seeing that Herod would give more, would not be suborned by him: yet counterfeiting himselfe to be Antigonus his friend, meaning under that pretence to creep into the knowledge of his secrets; which not regarding Herods counsell he went to discover, notwithstanding that Herod dissuaded him from it: But Antigonus perceiving his intent, shut him out of the Citie, and like an enemy drave him away from the wals, till such time as Machara was ashamed of that he had done; and so returned to Amathunt unto Herod. And being in a rage that things fell out against his expectation, he killed all the Jews he found, not respecting whether they favoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod hereat was moved, and thought to be revenged upon Machara as upon an enemy; yet he bridled himselfe and hasted to Antonius to let him understand Macharas cruelty, Machara remembring how he had offended, followed the King, and with many entreaties besought him to be friends, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his journey to Antonius, and hearing that he was now with a great army besieging Samosata (which was a very strong city neer unto Euphrates) he made the more haste; thinking it now a fit time to shew his vertue, and that hereby he might winne Antonius favour the more. So soon as he came to Antonius he ended the siege, killing a great number of enemies, and had for his labour a great part of the spoile: and Antonius though before he admired his vertue; yet then was his opinion encreased, so that he had a greater hope of his honour and attaining to the kingdome. So Antigonus was constrained to render the Citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the death of JOSEPH: how HEROD besieged Jerusalem: and how
ANTIGONUS was slain.

An. 1. 14. c. 15.

IN the mean season Herods affairs in Judaea went backward: for he left his brother Ioseph Governour of all, commanding him to doe nothing against Antigonus till his return. For he little trusted to Macharas help, because of the parts he had played before. But Ioseph understanding his brother to be farre off, not regarding what charge was left him, went to Jericho accompanied with five companies which Machara sent with him, thinking now in harvest time to have taken away their corne: but being assaulted by the enemy upon the mountains and in difficult places, himselfe was there slain, shewing himself in that fight a worthy and valiant man: and there was not one left alive of all the Romane souldiers; for they were all newly gathered out of Syria, and they had no old souldiers amongst them to assist them who were ignorant in warfare. Antigonus not contented with the victory, became such a tyrant, that he caused the dead corps of Ioseph to be scourged: and having the dead bodies in his power, he cut off Iosephs head, although Phelorus his brother offered fiftie talents to redeeme the same.

After

A After Antigonus had obtained this victory, there was such a change in Galilee, that those who favoured him, took the chiefeft of Herods favourites, and drowned them in a pond. Also there arose a great change in Idumæa, where Machara repaired the wals of a certain castle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the news; for after Samosata was taken, Antonius made Sofius Governour of Syria, leaving order with him, that he should helpe Herod against Antigonus, and so he departed into Egypt. Sofius sent two companies of souldiers with Herod into Judæa to help him, and he himself with the rest of the army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia neer Daphne, his brothers death was manifested unto him in a dreame: And whilest he was troubled thus, so that he leapt out of his bed, even at the same instant the messengers who brought tidings of his death, entred into the house: and weeping a little for grief, as it were deferring his sorrow till another time, he went towards his enemies; so that he hasted above his strength. When he came to Libanus, he took eight hundred inhabitants of that mountain to help him, and joyned unto them one of the Romane legions; and not expecting the day-time, with them he entred into Galilee, and meeting with his enemies, he forced them to flie unto the place from whence they came: and every day he assaulted their Castle: But before he could take it, being wearied with cruell winter, he was constrained to leade his army into the next village: Within a few daies his number being increased by one other legion which Antonius sent, he put his enemies in such a feare, that they in the night time fled and forsook the Castle. And now he hasted to Jericho to be revenged upon those that killed his brother: where there befell him a most strange accident, from the which being against all hope delivered, he perswaded himself that God bare an especiall love unto him. For when many Nobles that night had supped with him, supper being ended, and every one being gone forth, incontinently the house wherein he supt fell down: Herod took this as a Prælagium both of the dangers and prosperous successe he was to have in his wars. And the next morning early he removed from thence, and about 6000. of the enemies descending from the mountains, assaulted the vanguard, but they durst not joyn battell with the Romanes, but molested them standing as farre off with stones and darts, and they wounded many: so that also Herod himself passing along, was wounded in the side with a dart. Antigonus desirous to shew himself most potent, as well in multitude of men, as also in courage, sent Pappus a friend of his, with an army into Samaria, who there got the victory of Machara. Herod went about the enemies countrey and took there five towns, and destroyed two thousand of the inhabitants, and firing the houses, he returned to his army neer unto a village called Cana.

Every day there came flocking unto him a very great number of Jews, both from Jericho and from other parts of the countrey, some of them hating Antigonus, others some loving Herod for his valiant deeds: for many without any reason desired an alteration. Whilest thus he hasted to fight, Pappus with his men neither fearing the multitude, nor strength of their enemies, came fiercely upon them, and offered battell. The battell being begun, the others while abstained, onely Herod remembring his brothers death, ventured more then the rest, to the end to be revenged upon them that were the authors thereof: and so he easily overcame the enemies army, and still assaulting the fresh men, he put them all to flight. There was a mighty slaughter: for many being forced to flie into the village from whence they came, he pursued them and slew an infinite number. Lastly, rushing amongst the enemies that fled, he brake into the village, where all the houses were full of armed men, and every house top full of men to defend it: and because he easily overcame those that were abroad, he overthrew the houses, and so forced them that were within to come forth. Others he killed in companies with the ruines of the houses wherein they were, and if any one chanced to escape, the souldiers without that were already armed, with swords kild them: so that there were such heapes of dead bodies, that they who had the victory could not passe thorow the streets for them. The enemies were so discouraged with this overthrow, that the whole multitude of them (seeing those that were slain in the village) fled away: and Herod by the benefit of his good fortune had even then come to Jerusalem, had not winter stormes hindered him, which was the onely cause that he at that time got not a full conquest; and that Antigonus was not utterly overthrown, who through feare and desperation was purposed to leave the City. But Herod towards night having given his friends leave to depart to rest their wearie bodies, being himselfe heated with his armour, after the maner of souldiers, went to wash himselfe, accompanied onely with one Page. And before he came to the bath, one of his enemies met him having a sword drawn in his hand, and then another, and afterwards a third, and after them more: and these escaped out of the battell, and came to the bath to hide themselves, and seeing the King there, they were sore afraid, and sought to hide themselves, and so passed by him being astonished and amazed, although the King at that time was naked and weaponlesse: and in so much as none were present there to surprize them, they escaped; and Herod was very well contented that he had no harme by them. The next day after, he beheaded Pappus, who was the Generall of Antigonus his army, and sent his head to his brother Pheroras, who was made ruler of his army, in revenge of his brother that was slain: for Pappus was he that slew Ioseph.

The winter being past, he with his army came to Jerusalem, and besieged it, pitching his tents before the Temple, where it was easiest to take the City, and where beforetime Pampey had entred it (which was about the third year after Herod was made King in Rome.) Now when he had quartered his army as he thought best for his purpose, and cut off the suburbs, he caused three rampiers to be raised, and towers to be builded upon them: and leaving there his trusty friends that would not slack their businesse, he went into Samaria to visite his betrothed, which was the daughter of Alexander, who was sonne to Aristobulus, who (as we before made mention) was espoused unto him: and he wedded her even in the time of the siege, as who should say, now he contemned his enemies: after his marriage rites were performed, he returned to Jerusalem with a farre greater army: Sosius also seconded him with a great army of footmen, and horsemen, whom he sent before him thorow the midst of the countrey; and he himselfe came after by Phoenicia. Now when all his whole army was assembled together, to the number of about some eleven legions of footmen, and six thousand horsemen, besides the Syrians that came to helpe him, which were no small number, he laied his assault and battery to the northermost wall; and the rather because he thought himselfe warranted by the decree of the Senate, whereby he was declared to be King. Sosius also was warranted by Antonies letters, whereby he commanded him to help Herod with all the armie that was under his government. Mean while those Jews that were within the City were diversly troubled: for a multitude of the weaker sort, gathering themselves together about the Temple, grew to this resolution; that whosoever should fortune to die in this attempt, should be most happy and beloved of God. But those who were hardiest amongst them, joyning themselves together, robbed and took away from the rest what they could, but in especiall they took the goods from that part that was next the citie: so that they neither left meat for horses nor men, and the valiantest of them all being set to defend the wals against those that besieged them, hindred the adversary from erecting their rampires; so that they still found some new device to hinder the force of their engines; neither did they any waies prevaile so much as by their mynes which they made. As for the theeves, the King sought to repress their incursions, by placing an ambush of men to intercept them; by which means he relieved the want and scarcity of victuals, by fetching provision from places farre distant: But notwithstanding they in their fight failed in no sort to expresse their incredible valour; yet did that military experience which the Romanes had, over-master them by odds. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the imminent danger wherein they were plunged, they fought with them in open field: but where it chanced that the Romanes by digging two severall mynes, brake all at once into the midst of them; yet suddenly repaired they the breach that was made in the wall, and fortified the other part thereof. In a word, they neither spared hands nor engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out even unto the last cast: and although they were besieged with so huge an army, yet they defended the town from them five moneths, till such time as certain of Herods chosen men, valiantly scaling and clearing the wals, brake into the City, and after them Sosius his Centurions. Those places that neere adjoynd the Temple, were the first of all that they intercepted; and the whole army entering the City, it was lamentable to see how in every corner the people were massacred: for the Romanes being displeased that the siege continued so long time, became more cruell, and Herods army endeavoured to let no one of the adverse part escape. By which means many were slain, both in the narrowest places of the streets, as also in their own houses: yea even then also when they fled into the Temple, without respect of age or woman-hood. For although the King intreated the souldiers to spare the people: yet for all that, they never restrained their cruell hands, but like mad men they raged against all, men, women, and children. At that time also Antigonus neither respecting his former condition, nor his present estate, came and prostrated himselfe at Sosius his feet, beseeching him to be mercifull unto him; but Sosius nothing compassionating his calamitie, cruelly derided him, and called him Antigona: yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in prison.

Now when Herod had conquered his enemies, he endeavoured to the utmost to appease the fury of the souldiers; for all the whole multitude were desirous to see the Temple, and the

A the holy vessels therein: but he resisted them, appealing some by threatnings, reclaiming others by force, and the rest by intreaties, supposing that it had been better for himself to have been conquered, then by obtaining the victory, to minister a meanes whereby those things should be discovered which were not lawfull to bee revealed. Hee therefore presently repressed the souldiers from sacking the city, inveying much against Sosius, and objecting against him, that the Romanes would desolate the city both of men and money, and leave him King of a place without subjects: adding further, that he esteemed not the Empire of the whole world to be a recompence for such a massacre of his citizens. Hereunto Sosius replied, that in equity the souldiers were to have the sacking of the towne, in recompence of that labour they had spent in the siege. But Herod gave him this answer, that he had rather recompence every man out of his own treasury, and by this meanes be redeemed as it were the reliques of his desolate countrey: and in the end performed that which he had promised. For he bountifully rewarded every souldier and captain, according to his merit, and gave Sosius a Kingly reward: so that no man went away without money. This done, Sosius dedicated a golden crown unto God, and so departed, leading Antigonus captive with him, to the end to present him unto Antonius. This man desirous to continue his life, and entertaining himself with this cold hope even untill the last, received in the end that reward which his faint heart desired, and was beheaded.

Herod being now king, made a distinction between the citizens, and those who had favoured him, he used very honourably, and put those to death who had followed Antigonus: and when money failed, he distributed all his Kingly ornaments, and sent them to Antonius and his company. Yet did he not quite redeem himself from all annoyances: for Antonius being now captivate through Cleopatra her love, in all things yeilded unto her desire: and Cleopatra having raged so against her own kindred, that she had not left one of them alive, now turned her fury upon strangers, and accusing the Nobility of Syria unto Antonius, shee perswaded him to put them to death, that she might thereby the easier obtain their possessions. Afterward, her covetous mind sought to effect the like against the Arabians, and the Jews also: in somuch that she secretly went about to cause the Kings of those places, Malichus and Herod, to be put to death. Antonius made a shew as though he would have granted her request, yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and so great Kings: yet notwithstanding, he no more accounted them his friends, but took a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their countries, and a vineyard in Jericho, where Balme grew, and gave her all the Cities on this side the river Eleutherus, (Tyre and Sidon onely excepted.) Now when shee had obtained the dominion of these cities, shee followed Antonius unto Euphrates, who set forward to make warre against the Parthians, and afterward by Apamia and Damascus shee came into Judæa: where Herod, having something pacified her angry mind with great gifts, obtained to pay her yeerly two hundredth talents for that part of his countrey, which Antonius had given her, and seeking by all meanes possible to get himselfe an interest in her favour, he conducted her unto Pellusium: and not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Ariabazes, the sonne of Tigranes, captive, and gave him to Cleopatra: for all the money and riches which he had got, and the captives likewise, were bestowed on her.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the treacherous practice of CLEOPATRA against HEROD: of HERODS warre against the Arabians, and of a very great earthquake.

ABout such time as the Actiack warre was a foot, Herod prepared himself to attend Antonius, seeing for the present all troubles were pacified in Judæa, and he had already got the castle of Hircanion, which Antigonus sister had in her possession. But Cleopatra craftily prevented him in this his journey, so that he could not go with Antonius: for she desiring the ruines of both the Kings (as was before mentioned) perswaded Antonius that he should cause Herod to make warre against the Arabians: whom if he overcame, then she should be made Queen of Arabia, and if so be himself were overcome, then she should be Queen of Judæa: intending hereby, that one of these Potentates should ruinate the other. But this practice of hers was greatly to Herods gain: for first of all, making head against those of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of horsemen he could make, which was very many, and meeting them at Diospolis, he overcame them, though they valiantly resisted: who having the overthrow, stirred up a mighty army army of the Arabians to help them, so that an infinite company was gathered together about Coelosyria, expecting the Jews weer unto the citie called Canatha. Where King Herod meet- ing them, purposed not to fight unadvisedly, but to compasse his own army round about with a wal: but his army remembring their former victory, would not be counselled, but violently assaulted the Arabians, and at the first onset put them to flight. Herod pursuing his enemy, was greatly endangered by the treason of the inhabitants of Canatha (who were set on by Athenio, that was one of Cleopatras captains, who had alwayes born him ill will) for the Ara- bians encouraged by their help, returned again to battell; and they two joynd their forces together, and set upon Herod in stony and difficult places, and put his army to flight, and slew many of them: and those that escaped fled into a little village hard by, called Ormiza, where the Arabians compassing them about, took both the men and their tents with all their furniture. Not long after this overthrow of Herods souldiers, he came and brought help, but too late, and to little purpose: but the cause hereof was, for that the Captains of his army would not obey his commandment: for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to work him that injurie, yet was he revenged upon the Arabians, and daily made incursions upon their borders, and ceased not to invade and spoil them, until by many, he had cried quittance with them for their one victory.

While thus he pursued his enemies, a great calamitie befell him in the seventh yeer of his reigne, and in the midst of the Aſſian warre: for about the beginning of the spring time, there chanced a great earthquake, which slew an infinite multitude of beasts, and thirtie thousand people: yet the army had no harm, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof, the Arabians were highly encouraged (for such as report an evill occurrent, do al- wayes redouble the miserie thereof in relating it) for which cause, the Arabians, making ac- count that all Judæa was overthrown, and that there was no man left alive to resist them, en- tred into Judæa, assuring themselves to conquer the countrey: and before their coming, they slew the Embassadors of the Jews that were sent unto them. Herod, perceiving his coun- treymen terrified by the sudden approach of their enemies, and not onely broken, but wea- ried with the greatnesse and continuance of their calamities, rowzed up their drooping spirits that were tired with suspect, and encouraged them on this wise: I see no reason of your present fear, neither do I admire, that you were terrified with the punishment of Gods in- dignation: but it is a cowardly minde to be daunted by the coming of your enemies, who are but men, and whose violence, if your selves please, ye may repress. For mine own part, I am so farre from being discouraged by the approach of my enemies, that I rather think that God hath of his providence sent this earthquake as a bait to allure and incite the Ara- bians to invade us, to the end, that through our means he may punish them: for the cause that moveth them to assault us, is not the trust they repose in their own valour and great army, but it is our miserie that inviteth them. Yet who knows not that the hope is frustrated that is founded not upon a mans private vertue, but upon another mans misfortune? There is no- thing assured in humane affairs, in respect either of prosperous successe, or adverse fortune, which a man may perceive to alter upon all occurrents: as we our selves may wisse by our own experience. For in the first conflict ye overcame, in the second ye were overcome, and now the third time (for ought I can conjecture) they, thinking themselves sure of the victo- rie, shall by us be overcome: for they who misdoubt nothing, are rash in their proceedings, whereas they that are fearfull and timorous, providently seek to prevent their dangers: so that I am encouraged to hope for victory even by your fear.

For when as you were too confident, and against my will and direction rushed in upon your enemies, Athenio found opportunitie to hurt us: but now sith I perceive in your minds a certain remissnesse and a forecast, it is an evident token unto me of an assured victory. It behoveth you therefore not onely before the conflict to continue your accustomed minds, but also in the conflict to shew that ye are men, armed both with hearts and hardnesse; to the end, that our impious enemies may well see, that neither any humane calamitie, nor di- vine punishment can daunt the courage of the Jews, whilest their breath is in their bodies: and that never a one of you all will suffer the Arabians to domineer over your goods and possessions, whom many times you have almost made your slaves. Be not therefore terrified with this motion of a body that hath no soul: neither yet perswade your selves, that the earthquake portendeth any massacre, for even the elements themselves by their own nature are subject to such defects, and portend no other mishap, but that which they bring with them. Perhaps the plague, and famine, and earthquake, have some tokens demonstrating them before they come: but when they are once come, they signifie nothing else, but at last, end and cease of themselves. But say we should be overcome, can warre enforce more harm,

A harm against us, then the earthquake hath done? Truly, it is an evident token of our enemies ruine, and that by their own cause, who most cruelly, contrary to the law of all nations, butchered our Embassadors, offering to God such sacrifice for the good successe of their wars. They cannot hide themselves from the sight of God, and from his mighty power, but presently they shall feel punishment for their offence, if filled with the courageous spirit of our nation, we be stir'd up to revenge that impious violating the law of all nations, and so every one march on to fight, not for his wife and children, or countrey, but to revenge the murder of our Embassadors: who will lead our army, & know better then we that are alive to direct the same. For my own part (if you will be ruled by me) I will be the first that will lead you, and will hazard my self for you: for you know full will, that if your valour be not eclipsed by some headlong rashnesse, their is nothing that may make head against you.

After he had by these or such like perswasions founded his souldiers, and found them in some sort encouraged thereby, he offered sacrifice to God. And presently after, with all his army he passed over Jordan: and pitching his tents at Philadelphia, not far from his enemy, he made a shew to assault a Castle that was between them and him, and so skirmished with them a farre off, desirous to draw them to the battell: for the enemies had sent to intercept the Castle, but Herods forces gave them the repulse, and in despite of them kept the hill. Thus every day made he an offer to fight, braving the Arabians: and seeing they would not come to the shock (for they were in great fear, and Archemus their Generall for very fear was ready to give up the ghost) he assaulted them in their trenches, and cast down their rampier, so as they were constrained to come forth to battell, without any order, and their horsemen and footmen were confusedly mixt together. And although the Jews in number were inferior unto them, yet they were inferior to the Jews in courage, yet they became now more hardy, because they despaired of the victory: and so long as they stood to it, they had no great losse: but when they turned their backs, then many were slain by the Jews, and many perished being troden on by their fellows. Those that escaped, were forced to retire themselves into their trenches, where Herod besieged them: and although they were all ready to be put to the sword, yet was there such penury of water, that for drink they were all like to perish. For which cause, they sent Embassadors to the King, offering him fiftie talents to let them go: but he contemned them, and so much more earnest was he, by reason that their want of water was so great, that coming out by flocks of their own accord, they offered themselves to the Jews: so that in this sort there came forth four thousand in five dayes, and the sixth day the whole multitude (despairing of their lives) came out to fight, with whom Herod conflicting, slew about seven thousand. Having in this sort weakened the Arabians, that he had now extinguished all their strong men, the countrey men admired him, and were so much daunted at his puissance, that they wished him for their Ruler.

How HEROD was exalted to the kingdom.

Ncontinent after this his prosperous successe, there did betide unto him a sea of cares and griefs, in respect of the love which he bare unto Antonius, whom Caesar had now lately overthrown at the battell which was fought at Actium: yet was he more afraid then hurt by this his suspicion: for Caesar accounted not Antonius fully conquered, so long as Herod and he kept together. Wherefore, the King timely foreseeing those dangers that might ensue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Caesar abode: in which place, in the habite of a private man, and without a Crown, but with a Kingly courage, he presented himself before him, and with unfained constancie spake unto him in such manner as followeth; I was, O Caesar, made King of Judaea by Antonius his means: and I must confesse, that I have been a King, who, what in me lay, have served his turn, and fought his profit: yea, I must not deny, but that (had not the Arabians hindered me) I had with all the power I could have made, seconded and assisted Antonius against thee: yea, although personally I could not go, yet did I what I could to help him, and sent him many thousand measures of corn. Nay, though he had the overthrow at Actium, yet did not I forsake him, who had deserved well at my hands: and although I was not able to assist him with force of arms, yet I confirmed him by my counsell the best I could, inculcating oftentimes unto him, that there was one only way to redresse his adversity, to wit, by the death of Clippus, whom if he killed, I promised him to assist him with money, strong holds, and an army; yea, and with mine own person person against thee: but the love of Cleopatra, and God who had already designed the victory unto thee, stopped his eares. For which cause, O Cæsar, I am conquered with Antonius, and have forsaken my Crowne and dignity with his fortunes: and I am come unto thee, hoping that at thy hands I may obtain pardon. To this Cæsar answered: Live in safety, and reigne, now with greater securitie then before, for thou deservest to rule others, who with such constancy didst defend and maintaine thy friendship. At this time endeavour thy self to continue faithfull toward them that are more fortunate then Antonius was: for, for my part I have conceived a great hope and expectation of thy valour and prowesse, yet did Antonius well, in that he rather obeyed Cleopatra then thee: for by his follies have we now purchased thy friendship. That thou hast begun to doe well, it hereby appeareth, because Ventidius hath signified unto me, that thou hast sent him succours against his enemies. For which cause, by this my present decree, be thou established in thy kingdome, and I will shortly let thee know, that I will be beneficiall unto thee: so as thou shalt have no cause to bewaile the losse of Antonius. By this speech he exhorted the King not to misdoubt of his friendship, and withall put a Crowne upon his head, and made a decree, and sealed it, testifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod, and confirmed him in his kingdome, and rehearsed many things therein, greatly tending to Herods praise. Herod (having first pacified Cæsar with many gifts) requested him to pardon Alexander, one of Antonius his friends, who earnestly and in humble maner desired the same: but Cæsar being very angry, answered, that he for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended, and so repeld Herod with this answer.

Herods gratulation toward Cæsar.

Cæsar increaseth
Herods dominion.

Herod made Governour of Syria.

Afterward, Cæsar, travailing into Egypt through Syria, was entertained by Herod with all royall pompe possible: and that was the first time that he shewed himself to take part with Cæsar, when neer unto Ptolemais he took a view of the souldiers with Cæsar, and made a banquet for him and all his friends, and feasted the whole armie likewise. And in as much as he travailed to Pelusium thorow dry grounds, when they returned again, he provided water for them, and furnished the army with all necessaries: so that both Cæsar and the souldiers thought the kingdome a small recompence for his deserts. For which cause, after he came into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, he did not onely increase his honour, but also restored unto him that portion of his countrey which was taken away, and given to Cleopatra: and besides that, Gadara, and Hippon, and Samaria, and other cities about the sea-coast; to wit, Gaza, and Anthedon, and Joppe, and Straton's tower: and moreover gave him four hundredth Galathians, which before were Cleopatra her guard: and there was nothing that so much moved Cæsars liberalitie, as the courageous mind of him unto whom he was liberall. After the first Actian solemnity, he added unto Herods dominion Trachon, and Batanea, and Auranitis bordering upon it. For this cause Zenodorus (who for money hired Lisanius his house) continually sent theeves out of Trachon to robbe the people of Damascus: who in humble maner went to Varius (who was at that time Governour of Syria) entreating him to informe Cæsar of their calamity. Cæsar, understanding thereof, writ back again, commanding him to extinguish all the theeves: whereupon Varius with an armie went to those places which were most suspected, and rid the countrey of the theeves, and took the territory from Zenodorus: and Cæsar (lest it should again be a refuge for theeves to spoile Damascus) gave it to Herod, and made him ruler over all Syria. And ten years after, returning to his own countrey, he commanded the Governours to doe nothing without Herods counsell: and after Zenodorus his death, he gave him all the countrey between Trachon and Galilee. But that which Herod esteemed above all the rest, was, that Cæsar loved him best of all next to Agrippa: and Agrippa loved him most of all men next unto Cæsar. Thus now he touched the very top of felicitie, and so increasing in high mind, he employed himself chiefly to piety.

ings.

In the fifteenth yeer of his reigne he repaired the Temple, and enclosed twice so much ground as was before about the Temple with a strong wall, whereon he bestowed great costs and charges to beautifie it: as the great porches will testifie, which he built about the Temple, and a Castle on the North-part thereunto adjoining, which he built even from the foundation. The Castle was so rich and sumptuous, that

A that it was equall unto the Kings Palace, and in the honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. He builded himself also a Palace in the upper part of the city, and in it two houses, huge, and richly adorned: so that the Temple was not to be compared unto them. And calling them by his friends names, he termed one of them Cæsarea, and another Agrippa; whose names and memories he did not onely solemnize, and write in his private houses, but also throughout the whole countrey, and in every part of the citie. For in the countrey of Samarita he compassed a town with a wall, which was about twenty foulds, and called it Sebaste; and he sent thither six thousand inhabitants, giving them a most fertile soil and demeanes. There also amongst other buildings, he erected a very huge Temple, and dedicated it to Cæsar, and gave the inhabitants of that place especiall priviledges. About the Temple was there a piece of ground containing three foulds and a half. For this monuments sake, Cæsar added unto his dominion another countrey; for which cause he erected another Temple unto him, neer unto the head of Jordan, of white marble, in a place called Panium, where there is a mountain rising an infinite height into the aire, at the side whereof there is an obscure valley, where there are high rocks, that (by drops of water falling on them) are made hollow: so that the water, standing in their concavity till they runne over, filleth down with a stream of such a length as is admirable. At the foot of this valley on the outside, there spring certain fountains, and many think this to be the head of the river Jordan, which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

At Jericho also (between the castle of Cyprus, and the other ancient Kings houses) he erected other buildings, fairer and more commodious for them that came thither, calling them after the names of his friends. Finally, there was no convenient place in the whole kingdome, wherein he erected not some thing in honour of Cæsar: and having in every place of his own kingdome devised and dedicated Temples unto him, he in Syria also where he ruled did the like, founding in very many Cities, Temples, which he called by the name of Cæsar. And perceiving, that amongst the cities of the sea-coast, there was one called Stratons tower, which, being very old, was ruinated, and for the situation thereof deserved reparation and cost: he repaired it all with white stone, and built a very royall Palace therein, wherein chiefly he shewed a mighty minde. For this city standing in the midst between Dora and Joppe, there was no port or haven in that coast: so that whosoever sailed from Phœnicia into Egypt, were in great danger, by reason of the violent windes that blew from Africa, which blowing but a very easie gale, inforce the water with such a violence against the rocks on the shore, that the waves, rebounding back again a good way within the sea, make the whole sea tempestuous. But the King, with his liberality and cost overcoming nature, builded a port or haven in that place, farre bigger then that of Piræum, and within it made most safe stations for ships. And although the nature of that place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he so overcame that difficulty, that the sea could do that building no harm: and it was so gallant and beautifull to behold, as though there had been no let any way to hinder the adorning thereof. For having measured out such a place (as we have spoken of) for the port, he laid a foundation in the bottome twenty ells deep of stone, whereof most of them were fiftie foot long, nine foot thick, and ten foot broad, and some bigger; and all the bottome of the haven where the water came, was laid with these stones. Which done, he raised a wall of two hundreth foot; whereof an hundred foot was builded to break the violence of the waves, and had a name according to the use it served for. The other hundred foot served for a foundation of the wall whereof the haven was compassed, which was replenished with many goodly towers; the greatest and fairest whereof he named Drusus, after the name of Cæsar's kinsman. There were very many vaults also to conduct such things into the Town as were brought into the haven, and about them a paved place for them to walk in, that came out of the ships: The entrance thereunto was on the North side; for by reason of the situation of the place, the North-winde there is the calmest.

Before the entrance were three great colossus held up on every side with pillars: they which are on the left hand, are propt up by a tower being a solid rock of stone. But at the entrance on the right hand were two huge stones joyned together, which make a greater tower then the other. There is also a house adjoyning unto the haven built of white stone: The streets of the cities coming to that place, are of one bignes & proportion. Vpon a hill opposite to the mouth of the haven, was there builded a temple very beautifull and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæsar, wherein was placed Cæsar's colossus, fully as great as Jupiter at Olympus; for it was made after that example, equall to that at Rome, and that of Jupiter at Argos. The city he builded for the inhabitants of that Province, and the port or haven for sea-faring men. The honour and credit he attributed to Cæsar, and by his name called it Cæsarea.

Herod a great

Cæsarea. He also made other buildings, as the Market, the Theater, and the Amphitheater, which are worth the memory. And he every fifth year ordained certain sports, and called them after the name of Cæsar. And himself first proposed very ample rewards in the 192. Olympiade; insomuch that he not onely gave royall gifts to the victors, but also to the second and third after them. He repaired Anthedon also, which was destroyed by the warres, and called it Agrippium: and loving Agrippa very dearly, he caused his name to be engraven over the portall he builded in the Temple. Neither was he unmindfull of his parents: for in the richest soil of the whole kingdome he built a Citie for a monument of his father: and by his name called it Antipatriis, being a very rich soil, both for trees and rivers. At Jericho also he built a very gorgeous and strong Castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his mother. He likewise built a tower in memory of his brother Phasaelus, at Jerusalem, and called it Phasaelus his tower (of the compasse and beauty of this tower we will speak hereafter.) He also called another city Phasaelus, which is situate in a valley beyond Jericho, towards the North.

Having thus eternized the memory of his friends and kinsfolk, he did not forget to do the like to himself: for he built a castle on a mountain neer Arabia, having on one side a strong place of defence, and this Castle he called Herodium after his own name. By the same name also he called a tombe, which he builded sixty foulds from Jerusalem, artificially made in maner of a womans dudge, which he richly adorned: for within compasse of the top of it, he caused round turrets to be placed: and round about it he builded princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great way off, with grear cost and charges, and made a pair of stairs of pure white marble, to go up, which had two hundred steps. For the whole hill was made by art, and it was made of an exceeding height: at the foot thereof likewise he built another Palace, and houses to receive his friends and their carriages: so that this castle, for the abundance of all necessarie places, seemed a citie, and yet was it all the Kings palace. Having erected thus many buildings, he shewed his brave minde in strange cities likewise: for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Ptolemais he builded publike baths, which are called exercises. He builded the wall of Biblus, and seats, porches, temples, and markets at Berytus and Tyre: at Sidon and Damascus he builded a Theater, and a water-conduit at Laodicea, a sea-town. At Ascalon he built fountains or lakes very sumptuous, and baths with pillars, that for greatnesse and gallant work were miraculous. To other places he gave woods and ports: and to many cities he added fields, as though they had been fellow-cities of his kingdome. Also, toward the maintenance of baths he gave a yearly annuity for ever: as namely, to those at Cous, to the intent he might be an eternall benefactor. Moreover, he gave all poore people corn; and he often and in sundrie places gave the Rhodians money to build a Navy of ships. At his own proper cost he repaired Pythium, which was burnt with fire. What should I say of his liberality which he extended to them of Lycia and Samia? or the magnificent gifts which he used toward all the people of Ionia; yea, all things that their hearts could desire: whereby he relieved all their necessities? Nay, both the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolites, and the citizens of Pergamus in Mysia, received very many benefits at his hands. He paved also a large street in Antiochia of Syria, which was in length twenty foulds, and that with fair marble. This street before that time was so full of dirt, that no man could go thorow it; and all along it he built galleries, that people might go dry thorow it in rainy weather.

Some one may say, that these benefits he thus bestowed, were done for the proper use of those people on whom he bestowed them: but no man can deny, but that which he did for the citizens of Elis, was not onely common to those of Achaia, but to all the world, where the games, called Olympica Cerramina, were solemnized. For, Herod seeing them decay onely for want of maintenance, and that this was the onely remainder of all the ancient monuments of Greece, he not onely in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade which he assisted when he went to Rome; but also gave a yearly stipend to maintain the same, lest for want it should be left off. It is not to be told what debts and tributes he remitted, for he delivered the Phasaelites and Balaneotes, and other towns of Cilicia, from the payment of a yearly tribute: yet was he not so liberall to them as he would have been, fearing lest the envy of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if he should be more bountifull to the cities then those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a minde: for he was a very skilful hunter, wherein he had always his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding, so that in one day he killed fourtie wilde beastes. That countrey hath many Boars, but it hath more store of Harts and wilde Ases. He was such a warrior as no man was able to encounter withall; so that many

A many were astonished to see him exercise himself, who admired him for casting a dart, and shooting an arrow. Beside the vertue both of his minde and bodie he had also good fortune; for very seldome the event of warre was otherwise then he expected: which if it sometime chanced, it was not through his fault, but through the rashnesse of his souldiers, or else through treason.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the disagreement between HEROD and his sonnes, ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS.

The year of the world, 3954. before Christs Nativity, 8.

Herod besides the vertue of mind & body had the blessings of fortune;

BUT his private and domesticall sorrows seemed to envy him his publike felicitie, and most aduerse fortune befell him through the means of a woman, whom he loved as himself. For being now made King, he put away his wife, which he first married (which was a Lady born in Jerusalem, whose name was Doris) and married Mariamne the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus sonne, which caused troubles in his house, both before, but especially after he returned from Rome. For he banished his eldest sonne Antipater, whom he had by Doris, out of the Citie, onely for his childrens sake that he had by Mariamne, licensing him onely at festivall times to come unto the Citie in regard of some suspicion of treason intended against him. And afterward he slew Hircanus his wives uncle (notwithstanding that he returned out of Parthia unto him) because after he suspected that he intended some treason against him; whom Barzapharnes, after he had taken all Syria, took away prisoner with him. But his own countrey men that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiseration redeemed him from thraldome; and had he been counselled by them and not come unto Herod, he had not been killed: but the marriage of his neece caused his death: for, for that cause, and especially for the love of his native soil, he came thither. That which moved Herod to kill him was, not for that he sought the kingdome, but because he had right unto the kingdome. Herod had five children by Mariamne, two daughters, and three sonnes. The youngest was sent to Rome to studie, where he died. The other two he brought up like Princes, both for their mothers nobility sake, and for that they were born after he was King. But that which above all other was most forcible, was the love he bare to Mariamne, which from day to day tormented him more violently, in such sort, that he felt not any part of those griefs which this his best beloved enforced against him. For Mariamne hated him as much as he loved her: and having a just cause and colour of discontent, and moreover being imboldned by the love which he bare her, she everie day upbraided him with that which he had done unto Hircanus her uncle, and unto her brother Aristobulus. For Herod spared him not, although he was a childe; but after he had made him high Priest in the seventeenth yeer of his age, he presently put him to death, after he had so honoured him: who when he came to the altar clothed in sacred attire upon a festivall day, all the people wept: and the same night was he sent to Jericho, and drowned in a lake by the Galatians, who had received commission to perform the murder. These things did Mariamne daily cast in Herods teeth, and upbraided both his mother and sister, with very sharp and reproachfull words: yet he so loved her, that notwithstanding all this he held his peace. But the women were set on fire: and that they might the rather move Herod against her, they accused her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a shew of truth: objecting against her that she had sent her portraiture into Egypt unto Antonius; and that through immoderate lust she did what she could to make her self known unto him, who doted upon womens love, and was of sufficient power to do what wrong he pleased.

Hereat Herod was sore moved, especially for that he was jealous of her whom he loved; bethinking himself upon the crueltie of Cleopatra, for whose sake King Lyfania and Malluchus King of Arabia were put to death; and now he measured not the danger by the losse of his wife, but by his own death which he feared: For which cause being drawn by his affairs into the countrey, he gave secret commandment unto Joseph, his sister Salomes husband (whom he knew to be trusty, and one who for affinity was his well-willer) to kill his wife Mariamne, if so be Antonius should have killed him. But Joseph not maliciously, but simply to shew her how greatly the King loved her, disclosed that secret unto her: and she when Herod was returned, and amongst other talk with many oaths sware that he never loved woman but her, indeed (quoth she) it may well be known how greatly you love me by the commandment.

oration to the people, wherein he distributeth
honours to his three sonnes.

mandment you gave to Ioseph, whom you charged to kill me. Herod hearing this which he G thought to be secret, was like a mad man, and presently perswaded himself that Ioseph would never have disclosed that commandment of his, except he had abused her; so that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked up and down the Palace: whereupon his sister Salome having fit opportunity, confirmed his suspicion of Ioseph. For which cause Herod growing now raging mad with jealousie, commanded both of them to be killed.
Which done, his wrath was seconded by repentance, and after his anger ceased, the affection of love was presently renewed: yea so great was the power of his affection, that he would not beleeve she was dead, but spake unto her as though she were alive, untill in proceffe of time being ascertained of her funerall, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his passion for her death. Mariammes sonnes succeeded their mother in H her wrath, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their father as a mortall enemy, both before and after they went to study at Rome, and especially after they came again into Judæa. For as they increased in years, so did the violence of their minde increase.
And they being now marriageable, one of them married the daughter of their aunt Salome, who accused their mother, the other married the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia.
And now to their hatred was there joyned a libertie to speak more freely against them, and by this occasion of their boldnesse many were animated to calumniare them: so that some did openly tell the King that both his sonnes sought to work treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an army to help the other to revenge the death of their mother;
and that the other (to wit, he that was sonne in law to Archelaus) purposed to flie, and accuse Herod before Cesar. Herod giving eare unto those calumniationes, sent for Antipater whom he had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two sonnes, and sought to advance him above them. But they thought this alteration intolerable; seeing one, whose mother was but a private woman, so preferred: and they moved with their own noblenesse of birth, could not contain their indignation, but upon every occasion shewed themselves offended;
yet were they every day lesse accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himself into favour:
for he knew how to flatter his father, and raised many slanders on his two brethren, partly invented by himself, partly divulged by some of his favourites, whom he set a work about the matter, till that at last he put his brethren out of all hope of having the kingdome. For he was now by the Kings Will and Testament declared King, so that he was sent as a King unto Cesar in a kingly habit and pomp, onely he wore no Crown: and in time he so prevailed, that he wrought his mother into Mariammes stead; and with flatteries and calumination so moved the King, that he began to deliberate about the putting to death of his sonnes. For which cause, he conducted his sonne Alexander with him to Rome; and accused him before Cesar, that he had given him poyson. But he with much ado having obtained libertie to plead his own cause, and that before an unskillfull Judge, yet more wise then Herod or Antipater, he modestly held his peace in all things that his father had offended in: and first of all he purged his brother from danger of that crime, and taking the whole matter upon himself, he in very good sort acquitted himself thereof. And afterwards he inveighed against Antipaters subtiltie, and complained of those injuries, which had been offered him, having L beside the equitie of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himself: for he was a vehement orator; and knew well how to perswade. Last of all, he objected that his father having a desire to put both him and his brother to death, had laid an accusation upon him: whereat the whole audience wept, and Cesar was so moved, that not regarding the accusations that were laid unto them, he presently made Herod and them friends, upon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient unto their father; and that their father should leave the kingdome to whom he pleased.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he seemed to have forgiven his sons; yet laid he not his jealousie and suspicion aside. For Antipater still urged his argument to make Herod hate his other two sonnes, though for fear of him that reconciled them, he durst M not openly shew himself an enemy unto them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cilicia, and arrived at Eleusa, where Archelaus received him very courteously, thanking him for the safetie of his sonne in law; and very joyfull for that they were made friends: for he wrote unto his friends at Rome with all speed possible, that they should be favourable unto Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainment, he conducted Herod unto Zephyrius, giving him gifts to the value of thirty talents, and so took his leave of him. Herod as soon as he came to Jerusalem assembled the people together, and being assisted by his three sonnes, he shewed unto them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God, and thanked Cesar,

A Cæsar, who had appeased the discord of his house, and that had made his sonnes friends, which he esteemed more then his kingdome: and I (quoth he) will make their friendship firm. For Cæsar appointed me king, and gave me leave to chuse whom I pleased for my successour, for the which I give him hearty thanks. And now I here constitute all three of my sonnes Kings: which purpose of mine first I beseech Almighty God, and secondly you to favour: for the one of them for his yeers, the other for their nobility of birth, have right to the Crowne and kingdome: which is so large, that it may suffice many; so that you for your parts reverence them whom Cæsar conjoynd, and I their father ordained, giving them not unfit, nor unlike honours, but such as they have deserved. For a man cannot do a greater pleasure unto him whom he honoureth above his yeers, then he shall give discontent unto him whom he dishonoureth. For which cause, I will constitute to every one of them such friends and wel-willers, as with whom they be most conversant, and of them I will require pledges of a concord and unity amongst them. For I know that discords and contentions arise by malice of those who are conversant with Princes, and that if they be well disposed, they will increase friendship. And I request not onely these, but also all such as bear rule in my army, that they hope in me onely for the present: for I give not my sons the kingdome, but the honour and dignity thereof; and they shall have pleasure as though they were kings themselves, yet I my self will bear sway, although I am unwilling to do it. Let every one of you consider my age, my course of life, and pietie: for I am not so old that any one may quickly despair of me, nor I have not accustomed my self to such kinde of pleasure, as is wont to shorten young mens dayes, and we have been so religious, that we are in great hope of long life. But if any one despise me, and seek to please my sonnes, such a one will I punish. I do not forbid them to be honoured, whom my self have begotten, for that I envy them: but because I know well that such applauses nourish pride and arrogancy in the fierce mindes of young men. Wherefore all they that apply themselves in their service, consider that I will be ready to reward the good, and that those who are seditious, shall finde their malice to have an unprofitable event at their hands, whom they so flatter: I easily perswade my self that all men will be of my minde, that are of my sons minde. For it is good for them that I reign, and that I am friends with my sonnes. And you O my good sonnes, retain in your mindes that sacred nature, which maketh the very brut beasts to entertain naturall affection: then reverence Cæsar who reconciled us: and last of all obey me who request, and entreat that at your hands, which I might command, namely, that you remain brethren. And I will now give you both Kingly attire and honour, and I pray God that if you will continue and remain friends, I may continue in this minde.

After he had thus spoken, he saluted them very lovingly, and dismissed the people, some praying that it might be as he had said: others (who desired alteration) made as though they had heard nothing. Yet for all this, the dissension amongst the brethren was not appeased, but each of them mistrusting worser events, departed from one another. For Alexander and Aristobolus stomaked the matter, that Antipater had his desert confirmed, and Antipater was grieved that his brethren should have the second place after him, yet he could so craftily carrie himself, that no man could perceive his hatred towards them. And they derived of a noble race spake all they thought, and many endeavoured to set them on, and others as friends insinuated themselves into their companie, to learn what news: so that Alexander could not speak a word, but presently it was carried to Antipater, and from him to Herod with an addition; so that when Alexander spake any thing simply, meaning no harm, it was presently interpreted in the worst sense possible: and if he chanced at any time to speak freely of any matter, presently it was made a great thing. Antipater suborned men to set him on, that so his lies might be shadowed with colour of truth; and that if he could prove any one thing true, all lies and tales else divulged, might thereby be justified to be true. Now all Antipater's familiars were either naturally secret, or else he stopped their mouthes with bribes, lest they should disclose his intents: so that one might justly have tearmed his life a secrecie of malice. All Alexander's friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering speeches, wherewith Antipater overcame all, and made them theeves and proditors of such things as were either done or spoken against him: and himself doing all things, he dealt so warily, that at last those calumniationes came to Herod's ear: and he counterfeited his brothers person, and suborned other tale-carriers, telling what they could against Alexander; and pretending good will towards his brother, at first fainedly reproveth them, and afterwards seriously alleadged their sayings as accusations: so that hereby Herod was very wroth, but turned all as though Alexander went about treason, and sought to kill his father: and nothing made so much credit be given to these calumniationes, as that Antipater colourably excused his brother. Herod incensed hereat, every day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreased his love towards Antipater. The nobility also were inclined after the same maner: partly of their own accord, and partly for that they were so commanded: so did Protonotus the chiefeft of all the nobility, and the kings brethren, and all his kindred; for all mens expectation was upon Antipater. And that which grieved Alexander the more, was, that all these mischiefes, wrought to his overthrow, were done by the counsell of Antipaters mother, for shee being a stepmother, was cruell, and hated them being borne of a Queene, farre more then a stepmother doth her sons in law. And although all men followed Antipater for the hope which they had of him, yet were they also compelled thereunto by the Kings command, who gave an especiall charge to their dearest friends, that none should follow Alexander or his brother: so that he did not onely terrifie those of his own kingdome, but also those of other forrain nations. For Cesar had given him such authoritie: for he gave him licence to take any one that was a fugitive from him, out of any City, although it were not under his dominions. And the young men were ignorant of the offences laid unto their charge, and so were more easily entrapped being unaware of them: for their father did not openly tell them of any matter, but they every day perceived their fathers good will towards them to decay, which so much the more encreased their griefe. In like maner Antipater by little and little moved Pheroras their uncle and Salome their aunt against them, daily consuling with his wife, whom he should incite against them.

Glaphyra Alexanders wife increased his conceived suspicion by her words.

Now Glaphyra Alexanders wife encreased their malice every day, recounting her own nobility, and beating her self above all that were in the whole kingdome: for she derived her pedigree by the fathers side, from Timenus; by the mothers side, from Hysaspis his sonne called Darius: inveying very much against the basenesse of Herods wives, and his sister, who were chosen for their beauty, and not for their nobility of birth. For Herod (as we have said) had many wives, both for that it was lawfull by the custome of their countrey, and because Herod delighted in many; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyras pride and contumelious speeches. And Aristobulus made Salome his enemy, although she was his wives mother: for she was before moved by Glaphyras speeches, and he often upbraided his wife with her base birth, still telling her that he had married a private woman, and his brother Alexander a Queene. And his wife often with weeping teares told this to her mother: adding moreover, that Alexander and Aristobulus threatned, that if they got the kingdome, they would make their other brethrens mothers weave with their maides; and that they would make them notaries of villages, deriding them that they applied themselves to learning. Salome moved hereat, could not contain her self, but told all to Herod, who easily beleevved her, because she spake against her sonne in law. Moreover, another accusation was laid to their charge, whereat the King was greatly moved: for he was enformed that Alexander and Aristobulus did often bewaile their mother, and lament her hard hap with sighes, and cursed him: and that often when he bestowed some of Mariammes cloathes upon his latter wives, they threatned that in short time in stead of princely attire, they should weare a black habit. Whereupon Herod, though he feared the constant minds of the young men, yet because he would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them unto him (for he was to saile to Rome) and as a king threatned them in few words, and like a father gave them many admonitions, and requested them to love their brethren, promising them forgiveness of their former offences, so that hereafter they amended all. But they beseeching him not to beleevve accusations forged against them upon malice, and answering that the effect of matters would easily acquite them, requested him not so easily to beleevve tales, but refuse to give malignant people opportunity and recourse unto him: for that there would alwaies be some that would maliciously invent tales to tell, whilest there was any one that would give them the hearing and beleevving thereof. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their uncle, and both of them bare cruell minds, and were hard-hearted; and especially Pheroras, who was fellow with his brother of all, saving onely the Crown, and had his own revenues amounting to a hundreth talents a yeer and received all fruits of the whole countrey beyond Jordan, which was given him by his brother. Herod also had obtained of Cesar, to make him Tetrarch, and bestowed upon him a Princessse for his wife, desponsing unto him his wives sister, after whose decease he desposued unto him his eldest daughter, and gave him three hundreth talents with her for a dowry. But Pheroras fell in love with his maid, and forsook a Princessse: whereat Herod being angry, married his daughter unto his brothers sonne who was afterwards slain by the Parthians, but Herod presently pardoned Pheroras offence. Divers before this time were of opinion that in the lifetime of the Queene, he would have poisoned

A Herod and Herod although he loved his brother very well, yet because many who had access unto him told him so, he began to misdoubt: and so examining many that were suspected, lastly he came to Pheroras friends, and none of them confessed it: yet they confessed that he was determined to flie unto the Parthians with her whom he was so in love withall, and that Coffabarus, Salomes husband was privy thereunto, unto whom the King married her, after her first husband for suspicion of adultery was put to death. Salome her self also was not free from accusation: for Pheroras accused her that she had contracted matrimony with Syllaus, who was Procurator to Obada, King of Arabia, who was a great enemy of the Kings: and she being convicted both of this and all things else, whereof her brother Pheroras accused her, yet obtained pardon, as likewise Pheroras did: so that the whole tempest of all their family was turned against Alexander, and light upon his head.

The year of the world, 3946, before Christs Nativité, 8.

B The King had three Eunuches whom he loved dearly, and every one known by their offices: for one of them was his butler, the other was his cook, and the third got him to bed, and lay with him: these three Alexander with great gifts overcame. Which the King understanding, by torments forced them to confesse it, and declared with what promises they were thereto by Alexander induced, and how he had deceived them: affirming that there was no trusting to Herod who was a shamelesse old man, and that he died his haire, to make himself to seem young: and that he in despite of him would be his Successor, and then he would be revenged upon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and especially them: and that the whole Nobility did secretly obey him, and the Captains of the army and Governours did privily come unto him. Hereat Herod was so terrified, that he durst not presently divulge their confessions, but night and day he sent spies to learne what was said or done, and whom he suspected, them he presently killed: so that his whole Kingdome was full of iniquity. For every one as his malice mooved him, fained calumniation, and many desirous of blood-shed, abused the Kings wrath as they pleased against their enemies, and credit was given to every lie, and no man was so soon accused, but presently he was punished, and he who presently before accused others, was now accused himself, and carried to be punished with him whom he accused. For the Kings perils shortned the time of triall for their lives, and he became so tyrannous, that he afforded not a good look unto them that were not accused, and shewed himself most fierce and violent even to his dearest friends: so that he banished many out of his Kingdome, and railed against such as he had no power over. Antipater increased this mischief more and more, and gathering together a great company of his friends, he omitted no kinde of calumination. The King likewise was terrified by the rumours and tales of pick thanks, that he thought alwayes that he saw Alexander before him with a drawn sword. For which cause he suddenly took him and cast him in prison, and tortured his friends, many of which died in torments, because they would not confesse more then in conscience was true: others not able to endure the torments, were forced to confesse that Alexander and his brother Aristobulus thought to have wrought treason against their father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting, resolving in themselves, that having killed him, they would presently flie to Rome. E tempore to invent them, and the King willingly beleaved them, as it were comforting himself thereby, in that he might not be thought to have imprisoned his sonne unjustly. Alexander perceiving that it was impossible for him to abolish his fathers suspicion, thought it better to yeeld himself guiltie: and so wrote four books against his adversaries, and confessed the treason: affirming that he had many partakers therein, namely, Pheroras, and Salome, who were the chief, avouching that before that time he had had the use of her bodie in the night time: and how though he himself was unwilling, yet she forced him thereunto. Now the books came unto Herods hands, which charged the greatest amongst the Nobility with most hainous matters. Archelaus fearing his sonne in law and daughter to be in great danger, speedily came into Judæa, and ingeniously appeased the Kings wrath: for so soon as he came unto Herod, he cried, Where is that wicked sonne in law of mine, or where may I see the face of that wretch that goeth about to murder his father, that I may tear him in pieces with mine own hands, and marrie my daughter anew to a better husband? for although she be not privy to his counsell, yet is she defiled, for that she was wife to such a man. Nay I admire thy patience who art in such danger, and suffereest Alexander yet to live: for I came thus hastily out of Cappadocia, thinking he had been put to death, to talk with thee concerning my daughter, whom I married to him for thy sake and honour. Wherefore now let us take counsell what to do with them both: and seeing thou art so father-like and not able to punish thy sonne, thy treacherous sonne, let us change rooms, and let me be in thy place to revenge thee: with such like invectives he deceived Herod (though otherwise firm in his purpose.) Then Herod shewed him the books that Alexander had writ: and reading every chapter with deliberation, Archelaus took occasion fit for his purpose; and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and those that were accused in the book. And perceiving the King to give eare unto him, let us (quoth he) consider whether the young man was not circumvented by the treacherie of so many lewd persons, and not thou by the young man: for there appears no cause why he should fall into such wickednesse, who now enjoyed the kingdome and hoped to succeed thee therein, had he not been perswaded thereto by other men, who seeing him a young man, enticed him unto such naughtinesse. For we see that through such men, not onely young men, but also old men, and most noble families, yea, and whole kingdomes are ruinated. Herod upon these speeches began somewhat to relent, so that he appeased his wrath toward Alexander, and increased it towards Pheroras; for he was as it were the subject of the whole book. Who perceiving the King so to trust to Archelaus friendship, that he was led by him to do what he pleased; leaving Alexander, he in humble maner came to Archelaus, seeking impudently for succour at his hands, of whom he had not deserved any favour. Archelaus answered him, that he knew no wayes to obtain his pardon, who was guiltie of so hainous crimes, and convicted manifestly to have practised high treason against the Kings own person, and to be the cause of all these miseries that had now befallen the young man, except that he would lay aside all subtle dealing, and denying of his fact, and confesse the crimes whereof he was accused; and so in humble wise go unto his brother who loved him dearly, and crave pardon; promising him that if he would so do, he would do him what good he could. Hereupon Pheroras obeyed Archelaus his counsell, and putting on a black attire, he in a pitifull maner and with tears prostrated himself at Herods feet, and craving pardon, obtained it, confessing himself to be a most wicked and vile person, and to be guilty of all that which was objected against him, and that the cause which moved him to do all those things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into for the love of that woman. Now when Pheroras became his own accuser, and a witness against himself, then Archelaus endeavoured to mitigate Herods wrath towards him, and excuse his faults with fit examples: for he alleadged that his brother attempted greater matters against him, whom notwithstanding for natures cause he pardoned: adding that in every kingdome as in mighty bodies, alwayes some part began to swell, which notwithstanding was not presently to be cut off, but to be cured by easie means.

Archelaus using many speeches unto Herod to this purpose, at last quite appeased his wrath toward Pheroras, still counterfeiting himself to be angry with Alexander, affirming that he would take his daughter away with him, till at last he forced Herod of his own accord to entreat for the young man, requesting him again to despoise his daughter unto him. Archelaus after much entreaty answered, that he was willing that the King should bestow his daughter upon any fave Alexander, for he greatly esteemed the law of affinity. Herod replied, that if he did not divorce his daughter from Alexander, he should think that he bestowed his sonne upon him: for they had no children, and his daughter was dearly loved of the young man, so that if he would permit her to stay still there, for her sake he would pardon all Alexanders offences. Hereto Archelaus with much ado agreed, and so was reconciled unto his sonne in law, and he unto his father. Yet Herod affirmed that he must needs be sent to Rome to speak with Cesar, for he had written the whole matter unto Cesar. Thus Archelaus craftily delivered his sonne in law from danger, and after his reconciliation was made, they spent the time in feasting and mirth. Upon Archelaus departure, Herod gave him seventy talents, and a Throne of pure gold, adorned with precious stones, and Eunuchs, and a concubine named Panichis; and rewarded every one of his friends according to their deserts. And all the Kings kindred by the kings appointment and consent, bestowed rich gifts upon Archelaus, and both he and all his Nobility accompanied him to Antiochia.

Not long after, there came one into Judaea farre more subtile then Archelaus, who both disannulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and caused his death also. This man was a Lacedemonian born named Eurycles, who by money sought to have obtained the kingdome. This man brought unto Herod rich gifts as it were for a bait of that he intended; he had so behaved himself in Greece, that it could no longer tolerate his excesse: and Herod again rewarded him with farre greater gifts then those were that he gave him: but he esteemed his liberality as nothing, except he bought it with the blood of Princes. For which cause he circumvented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praising him fainedly, and especially by his own craft and subtile: and quickly perceiving his inclination, he both in word and deed sought to please him, so that the King accounted him among his chiefeft friends.

A friends. For both the King and all the Nobility honoured him the more for his countrey sake, in that he was a Lacedemonian. But he very easily perceiving the feeble stay of Herods house, and the hatred between the brethren, and how the King was affected towards every one of them, he first of all entertained himself at Antipaters house, making a shew in the mean while of good will towards Alexander, pretending and protesting, that in times past he had been Archelaus companion; and by this means he quickly crept into favour with him, as an approved friend: which was the cause that he was suddenly entertained for a faithfull man. He presently likewise brought him into friendship with Aristobulus; and having founded every mans disposition, he accommodated himselfe to all humours: and to begin withall, he became Antipaters pensioner, and a traytor to Alexander. And he often used hot words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that he being eldest of the brethren, so slenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him besides the Crown, which was his right. He many times likewise used the like words to Alexander, admiring him who was born of a Queen, and husband to a Queen, and yet would permit such a one who was descended of a private woman to succeed in the Kingdome, especially seeing he had such occasion and opportunity to effect the contrary: for he might assure himselfe of Archelaus his help in any thing. Alexander supposed he had spoke as he thought, because he counterfeited friendship with Archelaus: so that he misdoubting nothing, disclosed unto him all his minde concerning Antipater, saying, that it was no wonder though Herod disinherited them of the kingdome, sith beforetime he had slain their mother.

Alexander.

C Eurycles, counterfeiting himselfe both to pity them, and to be sorrowfull for their mischance, enticed Aristobulus to speak the like: and having animated them both to complain in this sort against their father, he presently went to Antipater, and disclosed to him all their secrets, forging also the treachery which those two brethren intended against him, which was to dispatch him with their swords. For this cause Antipater gave him a great summe of money, and commended him to his father, and being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Aristobulus, he himselfe became their accuser: Whereupon he came to Herod, and told him how in regard of those benefits he had received at his hand, he would now bestow his life upon him, and the light of this world for recompence of his hospitalitie; affirming that Alexander had lately stretched out his hand with his sword drawn to kill him, and he onely was the cause that he performed it not, staying his hand, and promising him to assist him in the matter: adding that Alexander used these speeches; that Herod was not contented to enjoy a kingdome which was another mans right, nor yet as it were to dismember his kingdome after Mariammes death, but he would also leave the kingdome, belonging unto their ancestors, unto a pernicious bastard, Antipater: and for that cause he would revenge Hircanus and Mariammes death: And that it was not convenient to receive the kingdome from such a father without blood; and every day he had occasion given him so to doe: for he could speak nothing without calumnation. For if any mention were made at any time of any ones Nobilitie, presently he was upbraided without cause, for his father would presently say, There is none noble but Alexander, whose fathers base birth is a shame and discredit unto him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his father was offended; if he praised, then it was said he mocked: so that in every thing he found his fathers affection turned from him, and that he was onely favourable to Antipater: so that he would die with all his heart, if he failed of his purpose; if he kild him, his father in law Archelaus would work his safety, to whom he might easily flee. And after, he would goe to Cesar (who as yet knew not Herods manners) for he would not stand before him then, as he did before, being terrified because his father was present: neither would he onely speak of his own wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole nation, who were oppressed by exactions even unto death. And then he would lay open in what pleasure, and after what sort the money gotten with blood was consumed: and who and what kinde of men they were, that were thereby enriched; and what was the cause of the affliction of the citie: and that there he would bewaile the death of his uncle, and his mother, and unfold all Herods wickednesse: which being once made manifest unto the world, no man would account him a murderer of his father. Eurycles having falsely reported this of Alexander, fell presently to praise and extoll Antipater, affirming that he onely loved his father, and hindred such practices.

The King, yet not throughly appeased for that which had past, grew into an exceeding agony, and Antipater once again suborned other false witnesses against him, who affirmed that they were wont to have secret talke with Incandus and Tyrannus, who sometime were Generals of the Kings horsemen, who were then displaced for some offence they had committed.

mitted. Whereupon Herod being very angry, presently tortured them: and they affirmed, G that they were ignorant of all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found and brought to the King a letter, as though it had been written by Alexander, unto the Governour of the castle of Alexandrium; requesting him, that he would receive him and his brother Aristobulus into the Castle, when he had killed his father, and to assist them both with weapons and other necessaries. Alexander affirmed, that this letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the Kings Secretary, who was both bold, and could counterfeit any ones hand; and having counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Herod caused the Governour of the Castle to be tortured, but he confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although he had no good proof of any thing, yet he commanded his two sonnes to be kept in hold. He likewise called Eurycles (who was the bane of his house, and the breeder of all the mischief) author of his safety, and one who had well de- H served at his hands, and gave him fifty talents: who, departing from Judæa before matters were well known, went to Archelaus, and faining that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he received there a piece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that he had evilly gotten, in as bad maner as he got it. Lastly, he was accused unto Cæsar, that he had caused dissension in all Achaia, and spoiled the cities: for which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment which was inflicted upon him for Alexander and Aristobulus troubles.

Cous Evaratus.

It is not amisse here in this place, to compare Evaratus of Coüs, unto this Eurycles: who being a deare friend unto Alexander, and arriving about the same time that Eurycles did, being put to his oath, sware that he heard the young men say nothing: yet his oath nothing prevailed nor profited them poore soules. For Herod would onely heare and give care unto accusations; and he highly esteemed them that would beleieve them with him, and shew themselves moved thereat.

Moreover, Salome increased his cruelty towards his sonnes: for Aristobulus minding to bring her into the same trouble with himself, who was his mother in law and his Aunt, sent unto her, willing her to look to herself, as though the King was minded to put her to death. Who being now called in question for the matters whereof she was before accused, to wit, that she purposed to marry with the kings enemy, Syllanus the Arabian, to whom she privily revealed the Kings secrets: this was the utter ruin of the young men, wherewithall they K were overthrown, as it were with a violent tempest. For presently Salome went unto the King, and told him what Aristobulus had admonished her of: and he being now outrageous, caused both his sonnes to be bound and imprisoned in severall places. Then sent he Volumnius, who was the Generall of his army, and Olympus, one of his familiar friends, unto Cæsar, to carry the informations against his sonnes in writing: who sayling to Rome, after their arrivall delivered the Kings letters. And Cæsar was very sorry for the young men, yet he permitted the father to do what he would with his children: and so wrote unto him, that he should have licence to do what he thought good: yet he signified unto him, that he should do better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquirie concerning the treasons: and then if he found them guiltie of those things whereof they were accused, to put them L to death.

Hereupon Herod, according to Cæsars letters and appointment, came unto Berytum, and there gathered an assembly to sit in judgement; the chief in that judgement were the Governours that Cæsar in his letters appointed, Saturninus and Pedanius Embassadors, and with them Volumnius, Procurator: next, the Kings kindred, and Salome and Pheroras: and then the Nobility of Syria, Archelaus onely excepted, who because he was father in law to his sonne, Herod suspected him to be partiall. But he suffered not his sons to come into judgement: for he knew that the very sight of them would have moved all men to compassion. And more- over, if they were permitted to speak for themselves, that then Alexander would easily have acquitted them both: for which cause they were kept in Platan, in a castle of Sidonia. The King beginning his oration, was as vehement, as though they had been present against whom he spake; and he was half afraid to object any treason against them; for that he had no proof thereof: and therefore he prosecuted their opprobrious words, injuries and offences, which they had committed against him, the which he affirmed to be more grievous then death.

At last (when no man contradicted him) he began to lament, as though by overcome- ing in such sort, himself was also overcome, and thereupon requested every one to give their verdict. And first of all Saturninus condemned his sons, but not to die: saying, that he had three sons present, and he thought it not lawfull to adjudge other mens sonnes to death. The

A The two Legats also affirmed the same, and many followed their advice: But Volumnius was the first that pronounced the sorrowfull sentence: after whom all the rest followed, some to flatter Herod, some for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation against the young men. Then all Judea and Syria expected an end of this tragedy, yet no man thought Herod to be such a tyrant, as that he would have put his two sonnes to death. Herod caused his sonnes to be brought to Tyre, and from thence by ship he conveighed them to Cæsarea, bethinking himself what death he should put them to. In the mean time, there was an old souldier of the Kings, named Tiro, who had a sonne belonging to Alexander, and highly in his favour, and he himself greatly loved the two young men: who being very much grieved in minde at that which had past, went about, crying, that justice was troden under foot, truth oppressed, that nature was confounded, and the life of man full of iniquitie; and whatsoever else grief put into his minde, who nothing esteemed his own life. At last, this Tiro came boldly to the King, and said unto him: O King, thou seemest to me most unhappy, who dost give credit to wicked and vile persons against thy dearest sonnes. For Pharoras and Salome thou beleevest before thine own children, whom notwithstanding thou hast often found to have deserved death; and thou perceivest not that they do this, to the intent to make thee want lawfull successours, and leave thee none but Antipater, whom they with their hearts would have King, because they can rule him as they list. But bethink thy self (O king) how all thy souldiers will hate him for the death of his two brethren; for there is no man that doth not pitie the two young men, and many of the Nobilitie are displeased hereat. After he had spoken this, he named them who were displeased: whereupon the king commanded them, and him, and his sonne to be laid hold on: and presently one of the Kings Barbers, named Tryphon, shewing himself to be in I know not what furie, came forth, and said unto Herod; Tiro perswaded me to kill thee with my razor, promising me, that if I would so do, Alexander would give me great rewards. Herod hearing this, caused Tiro and his sonne, and the Barber to be tortured, and they denyed all, and the Barber affirmed nothing more then he had already said. Then he commanded Tiro to be more tormented. Whereupon his sonne, moved with compassion towards his father, promised to disclose all the matter to the King, so that he would pardon his father: who being released of his torments, presently declared how his father through Alexanders means and procurement was purposed to have killed him.

D Many that were present thought this was a device of the young man, to free his father from torments: and yet others were perswaded that it was true. Upon this, Herod made a speech unto the people, wherein he inveighed against the Governours of his army, and Tiro, and made the people arm themselves, and kill both them and the Barber with staves and stones. Now he sent his sonnes unto Sebastie, which was not farre from Cæsarea, and there he caused them to be strangled: and having quickly dispatcht the matter, he caused them to be brought into the Castle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their mothers uncle. And this was the end of Alexander and Aristobulus.

Of ANTIPATERS conspiracie against HEROD his father.

E BUT Antipater now hoping without all controversie to succeed in the kingdome, was generally hated of the whole nation: for it was openly known, that he by false calumniation had caused his brethrens deaths. And on the other side, he stood in no little fear of his brothers children, whom he perceived now to begin to grow to yeers: for Alexander had by Glaphyra two sonnes, Tigranes and Alexander; and Aristobulus had by Bernice, daughter to Salome, five children, to wit, three sonnes, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamme. Herod, after he had put Alexander to death, sent away Glaphyra with her dowry into Cappadocia, and married Bernice Aristobulus his wife unto Antipaters uncle: for Antipater devised this match to become friends with Salome, whom he before-time hated and envied. He also by his great gifts sought to get Pharoras favour, and the friendship of such as were friends unto Cæsar, sending to that end great summes of money unto Rome. He gave Saturninus and all the rest great riches in Syria. But the more he gave, the more he was hated of all men: for every one judged that he did not consume such wealth, for that he was liberall, but that he lavished it out for fear, so that he got not the love of them, upon whom he bestowed it; and they to whom he gave nothing, were so much the more his enemies. Yet he became every day more bountifull, seeing, against his expectation, Herod made much of their children, whose parents he had slain; intending to shew how much he repented their deaths, by the pitie and compassion compassion he took upon their children. For assembling together his friends, he caused the children to be placed by him, and the teares standing in his eyes, he said, Hard, cruell, and sinister fortune took away from me the fathers of these children: but I pitie to see them orphans, and naturall affection commendeth them unto me. Wherefore I will endeavour, that seeing I have been an infortunate father, I may be a wiser and happier grand father, and leave them who are most deare unto mee, to reigne after me. Wherefore brother Pheroras, I betroth thy daughter unto Alexanders eldest sonne, that for that cause thou maist be carefull to provide for him, and assist him: and unto thy sonne Antipater I assure the daughter of Aristobulus, that so thou maist be a father to her who wants a father, and my sonne Herod, whose mothers uncle was high Priest, shall marry with her sister. And this is my will and pleasure touching this matter, and let no man who loveth me seek to alter this. And I beseech Almighty God, for the good of my countrey, and of these my nephews, to prosper these marriages, and to look upon these children with a more favourable eye then he did upon their fathers. Having thus spoken, he wept, and joyned the childrens hands, and courteously saluting every one, he dismissed the Councell.

Upon this, Antipater was amazed, and all the Orphans well perceived how sorrowfull he was. For now he thought himself dishonoured by his father, and that his good fortune was endangered, seeing that Alexanders sonne was like to have both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to assist him. Moreover, he considered how he was hated, and how the people did compassionate the children for that they were fatherlesse, and affected them, remembring their fathers who were dead, and were terrified at his wickednesse. Wherefore he attempted all meanes possible to break off the marriages, yet he feared to insinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very severe, and wary, and mistrustfull. And therefore went openly unto him to make his humble sute, and request him, that he would not leave him without honour, nor deprive him of that dignitie, which before time he had judged him worthy of, giving him onely the bare Title of a King, and leaving the substance of the kingdom in other mens powers. For it would be impossible for him to obtain the kingdom, if Alexanders sonne (beside Archelaus his favour) were by marriage made sonne in law unto Pheroras. Wherefore he earnestly besought him, that seeing he had a great many daughters, to change the marriages: for the king had nine wives, and by seven of them he had children; Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamme, daughter of the high Priest, and Antipas and Archelaus by Malthace, the Samaritane, and his daughter Olympias, whom his brother Ioseph married: and by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, Herod and Philip; and by Pallas, Phasalus: he had two other daughters also, Roxane and Salome; one of them by Phadra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wives, by whom he had no issue, his cousin, and his neece: and beside these, he had two daughters by Mariamme, sisters to Alexander and Aristobulus. Wherefore Antipater seeing his father had such choice of daughters, he requested the marriages to be altered.

The king, well perceiving his minde and purpose towards the Orphans, was very angry: and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his sonnes, whom he had put to death, he greatly feared, lest Antipater by some false accusations should overthrow them, and so with sharp words did drive him off for that time; yet afterward he so flattered Herod, that he got the marriages to be altered. And first of all he joyned Aristobulus daughter with Antipater himself, and his sonne to Pheroras daughter. Here one may see what Antipater could do by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed, although she was his sister, and procured many times Iulia, Casars wife, to speak for her, that she might marry with Syl-laus the Arabian; yet was not she permitted so to do. But Herod sware that he would account her as an utter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose, and afterward against her will he married her unto one Alexas, a friend of his: and one of her daughters to Alexanders sonne, and the other to Antipaters uncle.

As for Mariammes daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his sisters sonne, the other unto Phasalus, his brothers sonne. When Antipater had quite overthrown the hope of the Orphans, and joyned affinitie as he thought good, he now held himself on a sure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, he became intolerable to all men. And seeing he could not avoid their hatred, he now sought by fear to work his own safety, and so much the more, because Pheroras now assisted him, as one that was confirmed and established for King. Also the women in the Court fell at variance, and raised a new broil: for Pheroras wife, with her mother and her sister, and the mother of Antipater did use themselves very insolently in many things, abusing also two of the Kings daughters very contumeliously: to which matter she was chiefly set on by Antipater, who hated them, having the others at his command,

A onely Salome hindred their agreement: who went unto the King, and told him that their meetings were not for his profit.

The women understanding how she had informed the King, and that Herod was offended thereat, they came no more together openly, and abstained from their wonted familiarity, and in the Kings hearing fained themselves to fall out one with another. Antipater also made the same shew, so that he stucke not openly to offend Pheroras: notwithstanding, they had meetings and banquetts in the night, and the unity was the more confirmed because they perceived themselves to be noted: for Salome knew all this, and told it to the King. The King was very angry, and especially against Pheroras wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and having called together his kindred and friends, he laid many accusations against her before them, and told them how contumeliously she had behaved her self toward his daughter, and that she hired the Pharisees against him, and that by her poyson she had made his brother his enemy. And turning himself unto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather have him for his brother, or have his wife. And he answering, that he had rather dye then lose his wife: Herod doubtfull what to doe, turned him to Antipater, and commanded him never to talk with Pheroras, nor his wife, nor any one belonging to them after that time. But he obeyed his fathers command openly in shew, but secretly lay in their house: and fearing that Salome should perceive it, he by his friends in Italy caused himself to make a voyage to Rome, by letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that shortly after the receipt thereof, Antipater should be sent to Rome unto Cesar. Wherefore Herod using no delay, sent him presently, furnishing him with all things necessary, & a great sum of money: giving him likewise his last Will and Testament to carry with him to Cesar; wherein was written, that Antipater should be King, and after him, Herod, the sonne of Mariamne, daughter of the high Priest. But Syllas the Arabian, neglecting Cesars commandment, at the same time sayled to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controversie between him and Nicholam. He had also a great contention with Aretas his King, whose friends he had slain, and also Sabemus, the most potent in all the town of Petra: and seeing Fabatus, Cesar Procurator, he used his favour also against Herod. But Herod giving Fabatus a greater summe of money, alienated him from Syllas, and by this meanes dispatched that which Cesar commanded: and because Fabatus restored nothing to him, he accused him that he was Procurator, not for Cesar, but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moved; and being as yet in great estimation with Herod, he did disclose Syllas his secrets, and signified to the King, how that Syllas corrupted Corinthus, one of his guard, whom he willed to be taken and kept in hold. And the King followed his counsell: for this Corinthus, though he was alwaies brought up in the kings Court, yet was he borne in Arabia. Wherefore he presently took him, and two other Arabians that were found with him, one of them was Syllas friend, and the other, Phylarchus: who upon their examination, confessed that Corinthus for a great summe of money was hired to kill the king. After this, they were sent to Saturninus, Governour of Syria, and from him to Rome.

CHAP. XIX.

How HEROD should have been poysoned, and how it was known.

HEROD still urged Pheroras to forsake his wife: for he knew not how to punish her, having many matters against her: at last he was so moved that he banished his brother and her. Pheroras taking this injury patiently, departed into his Tetrarchy, taking an oath that his banishment should endure so long as Herod lived, and that whilst he lived, he would never come any more to him. Inasmuch as he would not come at his brother to visit him when he was sick, notwithstanding he was often sent for, when (as he thought) he lay now on his death bed, and would gladly impart something unto him: but contrary to all hope he recovered, and afterwards Pheroras fell sick. At which time Herod shewed his patient and humble minde: for he went unto him, and very kindly sought help for him; but he was too far spent, for a few daies after he died: and although Herod loved him untill his dying day, yet was it bruted abroad that he poysoned him. Herod caused his body to be brought unto Jerusalem, and commanded all his nation to mourne, and buried him with a sumptuous funerall. And thus one of the murderers of Alexander & Anistabulus came to his end: but shortly after, the revenge of that wicked fact did fall upon Antipater, who was the chief author thereof: it did but begin with Pheroras. For certain that belonged to Pheroras came in mournfull wise unto Herod, and complained unto him, how that his brother Pheroras was poysoned, and that one of his wives gave him meat that was not seasoned after the accustomed maner: which when he had eaten, he presently fell sick. And that two daies before his death, there came a Witch out of Arabia, who was sent for by his mother and his sister, to give Pheroras a love potion, and she in stead thereof, through Syllaus inducements, gave him poyson, for she was of Syllaus acquaintance.

The king daunted with so many suspicions, caused divers of Pheroras maids and libertines to be put to torments, and one of them impatient herein, exclaimed in this wise: O thou God, ruler of heaven and earth, revenge us upon Antipater's mother, who is the cause of these our evils. When the king understood thus much, he ceased not to search out the truth: and then the women disclosed Antipater's familiaritie with Pheroras and his women, and their secret meetings: and that Pheroras and Antipater, after they came from the king, used to drink with them all night long, not suffering any servant or maid to be in the room with them; and one of the Libertines wives revealed this. And when every one of the maids were tortured a part, all their examinations agreed; so that now it was evident wherefore Antipater had compacted to go to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the river Jordan. For they were often wont to say, that Herod having killed Alexander and Aristobulus; now he would come to them and their wives: and that it was unlike that he would spare any one, who spared not Mariamme and her sonnes: and therefore it was best to flee as farre as it was possible from such a beast. And that Antipater was wont often to complaine unto his mother, that now he grew gray-haired, and his father waxed young and lusty; and that it might so chance, that he should never live to be King, or if ever his father dyed, he should enjoy the pleasure of the Kingdome but a short time. And moreover, the heads of Hydra, that is to say, Alexanders and Aristobulus sonnes, began to spring up againe: and that his father had injuriously cut off all hope from his sonnes, appointing none of them to succeed him but the sonne of Mariamme: wherein he was perswaded that he doated, if so be he thought his will should be of force, for he would take such an order, that he would have none of all his progeny alive, and that Herod was the greatest hater of his sonnes of any father in the world: and was not therewithall contented, but he also hated his own brethren. Furthermore, that he not long agoe gave him an hundreth talents that he should have no conference with Pheroras: and when Pheroras asked wherein they hurt him, Antipater answered, I would to God that he would take away all men else, and leave onely us two naked, so that he would grant us life: but quoth he, it is impossible to escape this dangerous beast, who will not suffer men openly to shew friendship to one another. Lastly, though wee now secretly meet, yet if we bear the hearts and hands of men, the time will be when we may talk and meet openly. The maids in torments disclosed these speeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with them into Petra. Herod beleev'd all their sayings, and the rather for that which was said concerning the hundreth talents. For he said nothing of them to any one but to Antipater.

And first of all he bent his fury against Doris Antipater's mother: and taking from her all the ornaments which he had bestowed upon her, and bought with many talents, he banished her. When his wrath was some what appeased, he released Pheroras maids from torments: and now he became timorous and fearfull, and prone to any suspicion, torturing many that were innocent, for fear he should let any escape that were guiltie. Hereupon he set upon Antipater the Samaritane, who was Procurator for his sonne Antipater; who through torments confessed that his sonne Antipater had procured poyson out of Egypt to kill him, by the means of a friend of Antiphilus; which poyson Theudion, Antipater's uncle, took of him; and delivered to Pheroras: whom Antipater charged to dispatch Herod whilest he was at Rome, farre from suspicion, and that Pheroras gave his wife the poyson to keep. Wherefore the King calling for her, commanded her to bring forth that which was delivered unto her. And she, making as though she would have gone forth to fetch it, cast her self down from a house top, thereby to prevent the torments, which, if she were convicted, they would inflict upon her. But by the providence of GOD (as it should seem) it came so to passe that she fell not on her head, but on her side, and so escaped death, to the end that God might inflict punishment upon Antipater. And being brought unto the King, so soon as she began to come to her self (for she was amazed with the fall) the King demanded of her, wherefore she had done so, and sware unto her, that if she would truly disclose all, he would pardon her for all; but if she told an untruth, her body should be torne in pieces with torments, and not be buried. Shee a while held her peace, and at last said: Wherefore should I keep any thing secret, seeing Pheroras is dead, to save Antipater, who hath caused all our overthrowes? Hear O king, and God be witnesse of the truth hereof, who cannot be deceived: When I sat weeping by Pheroras, as he lay a dying, he called me unto him and said; See, wife, how much I am deceived con-

A cerning my brothers love towards me, for I hated and sought to kill him, who thus loveth me, and sorroweth so much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truly I am justly rewarded for my iniquitie. And now (wife) bring me hither the poyson which was left by Antipater in thy keeping for my brother, and make it away before my face, that I carry not with me to hell a guilty conscience for that crime. So I brought it as he willed me, and the most part of the poyson I cast into the fire, where it was consumed, and kept a little thereof to my selfe, for feare of mischances, and of thee. And having thus said, she brought forth a boxe which had in it a very little of the poyson. And then the King tortured the brother and mother of Antipater, and they also confessed that Antipater brought a box out of Egypt, and that he received poyson from his brother, who practised Physick at Alexandria. The ghosts also of Alexander and Aristobulus went all about the whole kingdome; and became as it were spies, to give notice of such things as were uncertain, who also caused those that dwelt in the uttermost parts of the kingdome, to come and give evidence of such things as were suspected. At last it was proved that Mariamme the daughter of the high Priest was acquainted with these conspiracies, for her brethren being tortured did confesse it. Wherefore the King revenged the mothers fault upon her childe: for having writ in his Will, that Herod his son should succeed Antipater in the kingdome, now for her fault he blotted that out.

CHAP. XX.

After all this, Bathyllus joyned himselfe with Antipater, as it were to adde the last hand unto all his practises. This Bathyllus, was one of his libertines, who brought another sort of poyson, to wit, of Aspes, and the poyson also of other Serpents: that if the first proved too weak and took not effect, that then Phororas and his wife should make an end of the King with these. And beside these shamefull practices of his against his father, he also had letters which he had counterfeited against his brethren. For Archelaus and Philip, two of the Kings sonnes, were at that time at Rome to studie, who were very toward young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be some hindrance to him; in that which he expected, he hastied by all means possible to make them away. And the better to effect his purpose, he counterfeited letters in his friends names that were at Rome, and he for money got others to write, that these two young men used in taunting wise to raile against their father, and openly to complain of the death of Alexander and Aristobulus: and that they took it in bad part that they were sent for home (for their father sent word that they should come away) and thereat Antipater was most troubled. For he before his departure from Judaea to Rome, procured such like letters to be forged against them at Rome; and so delivering them to his father, that he might avoid all suspicion, seemed to excuse his brethren, affirming some things that were written to be lies; other things to be offences, whereunto young men were prone. At which time he gave great summes of money to them in whose names he had counterfeited the letters against his brethren: hereby as it were hyring them to be secret. He gave them also rich apparell, and Tapistry of curious work: also silver and golden cups, with many things more, to the end that by the precious gifts and rewards which he bestowed, he might have all things kept close: so that at his return he made his fathers account that he had spent two hundredth talents, the greatest portion whereof was consumed in following the law against Syllaus. Antipaters small faults were hid by a greater: for all they that had been tortured, gave evidence against him, how that he practised his fathers death, and the letters witnessed how again he went about to make away other two of his brethren: and yet for all this, none of those who came out of Judaea to Rome, bare him so much good will as to give him intelligence what troubles were in the Court at home, although it was seven moneths after he was convicted, before he came to Judaea from Rome. Peradventure they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace by the ghosts of them who were put to death. At last he sent letters from Rome to his father, that now he would shortly return home, and that Cesar had dismissed him very honourably. The King desired greatly that the Traitor were in his power, and fearing that if he had an inkling of any matter, that he would look to himselfe, fained great kindnesse towards him, and sent back again unto him very loving and familiar letters, willing him to hasten his return: for if he made haste, it might be he should obtain pardon for his mothers offence: for Antipater understood that she was banished.

letter, farre truer then these fained calumniationes against me: let these plead my cause, let these shew my affection towards thee: remember how unwilling I was to saile to Rome, knowing I had here in thy countrey many secret enemies. Thou like an unwise father hast cast me away: thou forcedst me to give envy time to frame accusations against me: but now I will come to the proofs of these matters. Behold here I am, who notwithstanding a murder of my father, yet did I never suffer any misfortune by sea nor land: Is not this, O father, a sufficient argument of my innocencie? For I know, father, that before God and thee I am condemned; and being condemned, I beseech thee, give not credit to reports extracted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all torments upon me, spare not my wicked body: For if I be a murderer of my father, I must not die without torments: crying out aloud after this maner, and weeping, he moved all that were present, and Varus also to compassion; but Herod onely abstained from tears, for his anger gave attention to the truth. And presently Nicholas at the Kings commandment making a long speech of Antipaters craft and subtiltie, took away all hope of mercie, and began a very bitter accusation, ascribing all mischief which had befallen that kingdome, unto him, and especially the death of the two brethren, who through his calumniationes were made away: affirming also, that he used treacherous practices against those who were yet alive, fearing lest they should seek to succeed in the kingdome: for he who had prepared poyson for his father, would much lesse spare his brethren. And then coming to the proof of his pretence to poison his father, he declared in order all evidences thereof, aggravating his offence by Pheroras, as though Antipater also were the cause why he purposed to murder his brother; and how he had corrupted the Kings dearest friends; and so filled the whole Court with wickednesse. And when he had accused him of many other things, and brought proof thereof, he ended his speech.

Then Varus when he had commanded Antipater to make answer unto those things, and that he said nothing more, then God is a witnesse of my innocencie, he called for the poison and gave it to one that was condemned to die, who having drunk thereof, presently died. Then Varus talked secretly with Herod, and what was done there in that counsell he wrote unto Caesar. Yet notwithstanding when Herod had sent Antipater to prison, he sent messengers unto Caesar, to shew him his hard fortune and calamitie. After this it was proved that Antipater wrought treason against Salome. For one of Antiphilus servants came from Rome, and brought letters in the name of Acme, who was one of Iulia her maids, which she writ unto the King, telling him that she found a letter of Salomes amongst Iulias letters, and so for good will she had sent it him: the letter which she affirmed to be Salomes, contained many bitter invectives against Herod, and many accusations. But these letters were written and fained by Antipater, who for money had perswaded Acme so to do, as we have said: for the letter which she writ to Antipater evidently shewed it to be so: for she wrote as followeth: I have written unto thy father as you requested me, and sent also other letters: and I assure my self he will not spare his sister, if he do but read the letters: and you may do well, seeing I have performed all your requests, that now you would be mindfull of your promise. This letter against Salome and others being found to be counterfeited, the King began to doubt that Alexander was made away by such counterfeited letters: and he was very angry that he had almost put his sister to death, through Antipaters device. Wherefore he no longer delayed to punish him for all, yet he was hindred by a great sicknesse from accomplishing his purpose. He also sent letters unto Caesar concerning Acme the maid, and Salomes false accusation, and changed his Testament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his room wrote Antipas, leaving out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder brethren, because Antipater had accused them. And he bequeathed unto Caesar a thousand talents, beside many other rich gifts: and to his wife and children, and kindred, and libertines, about five hundred, and gave every one a great gift, either in ground or money, and honoured his sister Salome with most rich gifts. And thus he corrected his Will.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the golden Eagle, and of ANTIPATERS and HERODS death.

Ant. l. 19. c. 3.

Herods disease encreased, partly through age, and especially for his grief and sorrow: for he was now threescore and ten years old; and his minde was so troubled by the death of his children, that though he were in health, yet he took no pleasure in any thing: and his sicknesse was so much the more grievous unto him, because that Antipater

A was yet alive; for he purposed to put him to death when he was recovered of his sicknesse. To encrease his calamity, there arose a tumult amongst the people. For there were in the Citie two sophisters, who made a shew as though they were very skillfull in their countrey laws, and for that were renowned all over the countrey. One of them was named Iudas who was sonne unto Sapphara: the other was called Matthias sonne unto Margalus. These two were followed by a great many young men, so that when they expounded the law, they had an assembly like a great army, all young men. These two hearing that the King partly by grief, and partly by his disease was very like to die, spake unto their acquaintance, saying, that it was now a fit time wherein God might be revenged, and those things which were made against their countrey laws taken away: for it was a great offence to God to permit the Images or shapes, or likenesse of any living thing to be in the Temple. This they said, because the King had set a golden Eagle upon the chiefeest porch of the Temple, which the Sophisters now willed the young men to take away, saying, that it was meritorious, although danger might ensue thereon, yea, even to die for their countrey laws. For they that died for such a cause, should have their soules immortall and enjoy everlasting blisse: and that many unwise men ignorant of that doctrine, so loved their lives, that they chose rather to die by sicknesse then to spend their lives in a vertuous quarrell. Whilest they said thus, there was a rumour spread that the king was now at the last cast: whereat the young men being encouraged, about noone when many were walking in the Temple, they let themselves down from the top of the Temple with great ropes, and so with hatchets cut down the Eagle.

C Whereof the Captain of the souldiers being advertised, accompanied with a great many souldiers, went speedily to the Temple, and took almost fourtie of the young men, and carried them to the King. Who first of all asked them if they were so bold as to cut down the golden Eagle: and they confessed they had done it: then he demanded by whose commandement they answered, By the commandement of their countrey laws. After this it was askeed them why they who were presently to die were so joyfull? they answered, For that after death they hoped to enjoy many good things and eternall blisse. The King hereat greatly moved with anger, overcame his disease and went forth and made a speech to the people, wherein he inveighed against them as Church-robbers, and that under pretence and colour of their countrey laws and religion they attempted great matters, and adjudged them as impious people worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learn who favoured that act, requested him that first the authours of that crime, and then those that were found guilty therein should receive punishment: and that he would remit the offence to all the people besides. The King with much adoe entreated, caused the young men that let themselves down in cords, and the Sophisters to be burned, and the rest which were taken in that act to be beheaded. After this the Kings sicknesse spread over his whole body, and he was afflicted with most grievous paine: for he had a vehement ague, and an itch over all his body, which was intolerable, and a daily collick, and his feet were swollen, as though he had the drop sicke: his belly was swollen, and privie members putrified, so that wormes bred in the putrified places. He was also short-winded, and he was grievously tormented with difficultie of breath, and a convulsion of the whole body: so that some

E said that this was a punishment laid upon him for the death of the two Sophisters. Herod notwithstanding he was afflicted with so many and grievous sicknesses, yet was he desirous to live, and sought remedy whereby he hoped for health. At last he passed over Jordan, where he used the warme waters of Calliroe which runne into the lake of Asphaltites, and are so sweet that men use to drink of them. There the Physicians caused his body to be bathed in hot oyle, and it was therewith so dissolved that his sight failed, and he was as though he were dead: whereat those that were about him being troubled, with their cries caused him to look up, and now despairing of life, he willed fiftie drachmes to be distributed unto every souldier, and great summes of money to the Captains and his friends.

F As he returned, when he came to Jericho, he was in very great likelihood to die of melancholy, and there he devised a wicked fact: for he caused the chief men of every town and village in all Judæa to be assembled together, and then he shut them up in a place called the Hippodrome: and calling unto him Salome his sister, and Alexas her husband; I know, quoth he, that the Jews will make feasts for joy of my death, yet if thou wilt doe my command, I shall be mourned for, and I shall have a princely funerall. Therefore so soon as I have given up the ghost, cause souldiers to compass these men, whom I have here in hold, and kill them all: for that all Judæa, and every household thereof shall against their will bewaile my death. As thus he commanded this to be done, the Legates came which he had sent to Rome, bringing him letters, wherein was shewed how Acme Julia her maid, was by ther had rather banish him, he would condescend therunto also. Herod with this news was something refreshed, yet presently with paine he was overcome: for he both was troubled with a vehement cough, and almost pined with fasting, so that he thought to hasten his own death; and taking an apple in his hand, he called for a knife: for he was accustomed to cut the meat which he did eate, and then looking about him, lest any standing by might hinder him, he lifted up his arme to strike himselfe. But Achiab his cousin ranne hastily unto him, and stayed his hand: and presently there was made great lamentation throughout the Kings palace, as though the King had been dead. Antipater having speedy news hereof, was glad, and took courage, and promised the keepers a piece of money to let him go. But the chiefest of them did not onely deny to doe it, but also went presently to the King, and told him all what Antipater requested. Herod hearing this, lifted up his voice with more strength then was meet for a sick man, and commanded his guard to goe and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Castle called Hircanium. And then again he altered his testament, and writ Archelaus his eldest sonne, who was brother to Antipater, for King, and appointed Antipater for Tetrarch.

Five daies after the death of his sonne Antipater, Herod died: having reigned thirty and foure yeers after he slew Antipater, and thirty seven yeers after that the Romanes had declared him King. And in all other things he was as fortunate as any man; for he being but a private person, got the Crown and kept it, and left it unto his posteritie: but in his household affairs he was most infortunate. Salome, before it was known that the King was dead, went forth with her husband, and released all those that were in hold, whom the King commanded to be slain, saying, that the Kings miude was altered, and therefore he gave them all licence to depart: and after their departure the Kings death was published to the souldiers, who together with the other multitude were assembled in the Amphitheater at Jericho. Where Ptolomaeus Keeper of the Kings Seale made a speech unto them, and began to say that Herod was now happy; and comforted the multitude, and so he read unto them a letter which the king left, wherein he earnestly requested the souldiers to favour and love his successour. After the Epistle read, he recited the Kings testament, wherein Philip was appointed heire of Trachon, and the places thereunto adjoyning; Antipater designed Tetrarch, and Archelaus King. Him also he commanded to beare his Ring unto Cæsar, and withall notice and intelligence of the estate of the kingdome, whereof he had been gover-nour, fast sealed in writing: for he appointed Cæsar to be overseer of all his ordinances, unto whose pleasure he left the performance of his testament.

This was no sooner read, but presently the skies were filled with the voyces and cries of the people, who did congratulate Archelaus; and the souldiers and the people came in companies unto him, promising their favour and furtherance, and desired God alwaies to assist him. This done; every one was busied about the Kings funeralls: where Archelaus spared no cost, but buried the King with all royall pompe possible. The Beere whereon he was carried, was adorned with gold and precious stones: upon it lay a bed wrought with purple, whereupon was laid the dead corps of the King covered also with purple, with a Crown on his head, and a Diademe of pure gold, and a Scepter in his right hand. About the Beere were his sonnes and kinsfolk: and the Guard, and bands of Thracians, Germanes, and Gauls, all went before in order, as though they had gone to warres. The rest of the souldiers in warlike order did follow their Captains and Leaders, and five hundredth servants and libertines carried perfumes. And thus the corps was carryed the space of two hundredth furlongs into the Castle named Herodion: where, as himself had appointed, it was interred. And this was the end of King Herod.

CHAP. I.

OF HERODS SUCCESSOR ARCHELAUS, and how he entred into the Temple, and the mutinie that arose for the revenge of those that were executed for taking down the golden Eagle.

Archelaus being appointed successor in the kingdome of Herod late dead, necessitie constrained him to go to Rome, which journey gave occasion of new broils. For after that for seven dayes space he had celebrated his fathers funerals, and largely feasted the people (for this is a custome amongst the Iews, which bringeth many of them to povertie; yet he that doth not so, is reputed impious) he went unto the Temple attired in a white garment, where he was with great joy received of the people, and he himself sitting in a tribunall seat and a Throne of gold, did very courteously admit the people to his presence: and thanked them for their diligent care used in his fathers funerals, funerals, and for that they exhibited honour unto him, as though he were already King. Yet he said that he would not take upon him the authoritie nor name of a King, till such time as his succession was approved by Cæsar, who by his fathers Testament was Lord and master of all: and for that cause he withstood the souldiers at Jericho, when they would have crowned him. But he promised, that if he were confirmed King by those who were in authoritie, he would largely recompence both the souldiers and the people for their good will; and that he fully purposed to be better unto them then his father was. The multitude hereat greatly rejoyced, and made present triall of his minde and purpose; for some cried out, requesting that the tribute might be no more exacted. Others desired that the yearly payments might cease. Others requested to give all prisoners libertie. Archelaus in favour of the people granted all their requests: and then offering sacrifices, he banquetted with his friends: when suddenly after the noon time of the day a great multitude desirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the Kings death being ceased) began a private mourning, bewailing their mischance whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the golden Eagle from off the porch of the Temple. This sorrow was not secret, but the whole Citie did resound with laments for them, that were thought to have lost their lives for the Temple and their countrey laws. They also cried that revenge was to be taken upon them, whom Herod for that fact rewarded with money. And that first of all, he who by Herod was constituted high Priest, was to be rejected, and another more holy and devout to be put in his place. Archelaus, although he was hereby moved to revenge, yet because he was presently to take such a journey, abstained from it, fearing lest that if he brought the multitude into hatred of him, they might hinder him. Wherefore he sought rather by admonishing them, then by force to reclaim those that were seditious, and sent the Governour of the souldiers to request him to be pacified. But the authors of that sedition so soon as he came to the Temple, before he spake one word, threw stones at him: and in like manner they used others sent after him to appease them (for Archelaus dispatcht many messengers unto them) whom they spitefully intreated, making a shew that if they had been more in number, they would not have been appeased. Therefore when the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which the Jews call Easter, wherein an infinite number of sacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all villages thereabout for devotion sake to that solemnitie: and they who so lamented the death of the Sophisters, remained in the Temple, seeking by all means to nourish their sedition. Which Archelaus fearing, sent a band of souldiers and a Tribune with them, to take the chief of the seditious, before such time as they had drawn unto them the multitude of the people: against whom the whole number being stirred up, slew a great many of them with stones; and the Tribune himself being sore hurt, had much ado to escape. And when they had so done, they presently went and offered sacrifice, as though that no hurt had been done. But Archelaus perswaded himself that the multitude would not be appeased without slaughter: wherefore he sent unto them the whole armie, the footmen into the Citie, and the horsemen into the field, who invading the seditious people as they were sacrificing, slew of them almost three thousand, and scattered the residue into the mountains neer adjoining. There were also Criers who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by vertue of his command that every one should depart home to his house: so every one notwithstanding the holinesse of the day departed. But he accompanied with his mother Popla, Ptolomæus and Nicholaus his friends, went unto the sea-coast, leaving Philip for Governour of the kingdome, and over his household: with them departed Salome and her children, and the Kings brethren and kindred, under pretence to assist Archelaus to the Crown, but indeed it was to inform Cæsar of that which was done in the Temple against the law.

When they came to Cæsarea, they met with Sabinus Governour of Syria, who was coming toward Judæa, to take into his custodie Herods treasure: whom Varus forbade to go any further, being sent for by Archelaus, and Ptolomæus requesting him thereunto. And so Sabinus for the love of Varus, neither entred the Castles, nor shut up Herods treasure from Archelaus, but promised that he would let all alone till Cæsar understood thereof. But so soon as one of them that hindered him was gone to Antiochia, and the other, to wit, Archelaus, to Rome, he still remaining at Cæsarea, now hastened unto Jerusalem, and took the Kings Palace: where calling for the chief of the guard, and the Purveyors, he exacted of them an account, and sought to take into his custodie the Castles and strong holds. But the Captains of the garrison, mindfull of the charge which Archelaus gave them, kept unto themselves the custodie of all, affirming that they kept them more for Cæsar then Archelaus. At this time

Antipas

A Antipas made a claim to the Crown, alleading that Herods first testament was of more force then the last, and that he in the first was declared King; and both Salome and many more of his kindred, who sayled with Archelaus, promised him their aid. He took with him his mother, and Ptolomeus, brother unto Nicholaus, perswading himself, that they for their trustinesse and royalty unto Herod, would stand him in great stead: for this Ptolomeus was Herods dearest friend. He had also great confidence in Irenaus his Orator, because he had an excellent grace in pleading, in so much as he refused the counsell of them who sought to perswade him to yeeld unto Archelaus, both for his age, and for the last testament of his father. Now he was well beloved of all his kindred at Rome, because they hated Archelaus, & especially those that desired to live at libertie, and either to be governed by the Romans, or else to have Antipas for their king. And to further him the more, he used Sabinus letters unto Cesar, wherein Archelaus was accused, and Antipas commended. Therefore Salome, and the rest of their complices, brought the accusations unto Cesar. And after them Archelaus delivered all that which he had done, in writing, and withall, his fathers ring by Ptolomeus; and the reasons of that which he had done, he sent inclosed unto Cesar. Cesar pondering with himself what both parties alleadged, and the greatnes of the kingdome, and large revenues, and number of Herods children, reading also the letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called the chief of the Romanes to counsell. Wherein Caius the sonne of Agrippa, and his daughter Iulia, by his assignement, sate in the first place (this Caius was Casars adopted sonne) and so he licenced the parties to plead their rights. Then Antipater, Salomes sonne, being the most eloquent of all Archelaus adversaries, offered himself to be his accuser, for that Archelaus seemed now in words to contend for the kingdome, which he had already posselt himself of: and that he did now trouble Casars ears with vain cavillations, whom he would not wish to judge of his lawfull succession. For after Herods death, he suborned some to put a diadem upon his head: and then sitting in a throne of gold in kingly maner, he partly changed, partly advanced the orders of the souldiers, and granted unto the people their requests, which could not be effected but by a king. He had also set at liberty many men, who for great crimes were imprisoned by his father: and having done all this, he came now unto Cesar, to crave the shadow of the kingdome, the substance and body whereof he already occupied: so that herein he left nothing unto Cesar but a bare title. Moreover, he alleadged that Archelaus did but counterfeite sorrow for his fathers death, faining himself to mourne in the day-time, and in the night he would be drunk, and rioted. Finally, he said, that the sedition of the people came by hatred thereof. But the force and drift of his speech was altogether bent to declare the multitude slain about the Temple: for he said, that they onely came against that festival day to offer sacrifice, and that they themselves were sacrificed, as they were offering their sacrifices which they brought: and that there were such heaps of dead bodies in the temple, as never by any forrain warres were slain the like. Therefore Herod foreseeing his cruelty, never judged him worthy of the kingdome, till such time as his memorie failed him: and that now being more sick in mind then body, he knew not whom he named his Successor in his last will, especially for that he had nothing wherein he could blame him, whom in his former will he appointed his successor, when he was in health both of minde and body. Yet (quoth he) put case Herod in his extremitie knew what he did, yet (said he) Archelaus hath deprived himself of all kingly dignitie, having committed many things against the laws. For (said he) what will he be after he hath received authority from Cesar, who before he received any, hath murdered so many? Antipater having spoken much to this effect, and at every accusation taking witnesse of his kindred that stood by, ended his speech.

Then Nicholaus stood up, and first of all, he shewed that the slaughter of them in the Temple was necessarie. For they, for whose death Archelaus was now accused, were not onely enemies of the kingdome, but also of Cesar: and for other crimes objected, he shewed how that they were done even by the counsell and perswasion of the adversaries. He also requested that the second testament might be of force, for that therein Herod requested Cesar to be a confirmer of his successor. For he who had such remembrance, as to leave the performance of his will to the discretion of him who was Lord of all, did neither mistake himself in appointing his heire, nor yet was deprived of his senses, seeing he knew by whom he should be established. When Nicholaus had ended his speech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus coming into the midst of the Councell, prostrated himself at Casars feet: whom Cesar courteously taking from the ground, shewed that he was worthe to succeed his father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitive sentence: but the same day, the Councell being dismissed, he deliberated with himself, according to the

BEfore such time as Caesar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malthace the mother of Archelaus fell sick and died; and many letters came out of Syria, signifying that the Jews had rebelled. Which Varnus fore-seeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, went unto Ierusalem to repress & resist the authors of that sedition: and because the multitude would not be quiet, he left one legion of the three which he brought out of Syria, in the Citie, and so he returned unto Antiochia. But Sabinus coming afterward to Ierusalem, was the cause that the Jews began a new broyl. For one while he forced the garrisons to render to him the Castles, another while he rigorously made search for the Kings treasure: and he was not onely assisted by those that Varnus left there, but also he had a great multitude of his own servants all armed to further his avarice. And in the feast of Pentecost (so called because of the number of seven weeks) the people assembled themselves together, not for Religion sake, but for anger and hatred: so that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee and Idumæa, and Jericho, and the countreys beyond Jordan. Yet the Jews which were inhabitants of the Citie, surpassed the rest both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themselves into three bands, and made three camps: one upon the North part of the Temple; the other on the South part, neer unto the Castle called Hippodromus; the third on the West part neer the Palace, and so they besieged the Romanes on every side. Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, sent many letters unto Varnus, earnestly requesting him with all speed to bring succour: for if he did not, the whole legion would be extinguished. He himself got him into the highest Tower of the Castle Phaselus, which is so called by the name of Herods brother, whom the Parthians killed; and from thence he gave a signe unto the souldiers to issue out suddenly upon their enemies: for himself was in such a fear, that he durst not come down to the souldiers of whom he was Governour. The souldiers obeying his command, issued into the Temple, and there fought a fore battell with the Jews: who having no bodie to assist them, being unexperienced in warlike affairs, were soon conquered by them that were skilfull. At last, many Jews got upon the Porches, and cast darts at them from the toppe thereof, so that they killed many: but the other could not revenge themselves of them, who fought against them from so high a place; neither could they sustaine the force of them who joyned battell with them; till at last they fired the Porches, which for greatnesse and curious work were admirable. And so, many were either destroyed with the sudden fire, or else leaping downe amidst their enemies were by them slaine: others going backward, were cast headlong from the wall: others despairing of life, killed themselves with their own swords: and they who privily came down the walls, and assailed the Romanes, being astonished with feare, were easily overcome: till at last, all being either put to the sword, or cast down through feare, the treasure dedicated to God, was left destitute of keepers; so that the souldiers took away thereof about foure hundred talents, and that which they left Sabinus got.

But this losse of men and money stirred up many more Jews; and those more warlike then the first, against the Romanes; who besieging the Kings Palace, threatned all their destructions, unlesse they would presently depart from thence: promising Sabinus and the legion leave to depart if he so liked. Part of the Kings souldiers, who of their own accord fled unto them, did assist them. But the most warlike and valiant amongst them were three thousand of Sebastæ, whose rulers were Rufus and Gratus; one, Leader of the foot-men, and the other of the horse-men; both which, although they had had no souldiers with them, for their valour of body, and counsell, might yet have been a great help unto the Romanes in those warres. The Jews earnestly continued the siege, and assailed the castle walls, crying upon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now after so long time to have their countries liberty. Sabinus though with all his heart he wished himself away; yet durst he not trust them; but he suspected that their courtesie was but a plot to entrap him: and on the other side

A side hoping that Varus would come and help him, still endured the danger of the siege. At the same time there were tumults in many places of Judaea; and many through opportunity of the time aspired to the kingdom. For in Idumaea two thousand old souldiers, who had borne armes under Herod, gathering together, and having armed themselves, came and fought with the Kings forces, whom Achiab the Kings cousin resisted in the strongest villages, alwaies eschewing to fight in the open field. At Sephoris also a towne of Galilee, Indas the sonne of Ezechias the Captaine of the theeves, who before was taken by King Herod, and had wasted that countrey, gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the Kings armory, and armed all his company, and fought against them who affected the royall dignitie. Also beyond the river, Simon one of the Kings servants being faire and of a huge stature, put a Crowne upon his own head, and gathering together a company of theeves, went about with them unto Jericho and burned the kings palace and many faire and sumptuous houses there, and so got a great prey by burning the houses: and he had surely fired all buildings of account, had not Gratus Captaine of the kings footmen made hast to meet him with the bowmen of Trachon, and the most warlike men of Sebaſte, where many footmen were slaine. But Simon though he fled into a streight valley, yet he overtook him, and cut him overthwart the necke, and so he fell down. In like maner other of the kings palaces neer Jordan by Bethara were burned, by a multitude of others gathered together in bands from beyond the river. At this time a shepherd named Athrongeus presumed to usurpe the Crowne: he was thereunto induced by the courage he bare, and the disdain of death. With this resolution he armed his foure brethren, and every one of them had a company armed, and they were as his Captaines and Champions to make incursions: and he like a king meddled onely with great affairs, and then he put a Crowne upon his head, and thus he continued a long time wasting the countrey, and killing especially the Romanes, and also the kings souldiers, so that none of the Jews escaped if they were in hope to gain by them. They also presumed to meet a company of the Romanes at Ammaus, who carried corne and armour unto the legion, where they killed with darts one Arim a Centurion, and fourtie of the most valiant amongst them: and the rest, being in like danger, through the help of Gratus with the souldiers of Sebaſte escaped. When they had done many things in this maner against the inhabitants and strangers, at last three of them were taken: the eldest by Archelaus: and the two other who were eldest after him fell into the hands of Gratus and Ptolemas: and the fourth yeelded himself unto Archelaus upon composition: and thus at last they came to their end. And all Judaea by their example was filled with theeves.

of VARUS his deeds concerning the Jews that were crucified.

WHEN Varus had received the letters of Sabinus, and of the Nobles with him, fearing the whole legion, he hastened to succour them. Wherefore he came to Ptolemais with two other legions and four cornets of horsemen, where he willed the Kings forces and the Nobles to meet him. Moreover, as he passed by Berytum, they accompanied him with fifteen hundred armed men. Arctas also the king of Arabia, for the hatred he bare to Herod, was come with a great number of horsemen and footmen. As soone as the host was assembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his army into Galilee adjoyning thereto, and appointed a friend of his the sonne of Cains for their governor, who presently put them all to flight against whom he was sent, and having taken the castle of Sephoris, he fired it, and made the inhabitants thereof bond-slaves. Varus with the rest of the army went into Samaria, and took it, yet he did the City no harme, because he found that amidst all those tumults they had been quiet. When he had pitched his tents at a village called Ann, which was in the possession of Ptolemas, the Arabians sacked it, for they hated them who loved Herod. From thence they went to Sappho another strong borough, which they in like maner sacked and destroyed, with all the fruits and revenges they found there. All was filled with the slaughter and fires which the Arabians made, and there was no end nor hindrance of their avarice. Also Varus commanded Ammaus to be burned, being angry for the death of Arim, and the rest that were slain there: and the inhabitants thereof were scattered, every one by flight seeking to save himself. From thence he went to Jerusalem, and at the sight of him the Jews fled and scattered themselves, some here, some there, all about the countrey: they that remained in the City excused themselves, that they were not consenting to that tumult, but that for the celebration

the feasts sake, they permitted them to come into the City, affirming that they had rather been besieged together with the Romans, then to have conspired with those of the sedition: and so they laid the cause of that tumult upon others. But first Iosephus Archelaus his cousin, with Gratus and Rufus came to meet him, leading the Kings army, and the Sebastians and the Romane souldiers adorned in their accustomed apparell. Sabinus durst not be scene of Varus, and therefore got him out of the towne before, and went unto the sea coast. Varus divided his army, and sent it into the fields against the Authors of that tumult: and those that were brought unto him who were in lesse fault, he committed to prison, and those who were the chiefest he crucified, to the number of two thousand.

And understanding that in Idumæa there yet remained ten thousand of armed men, he presently sent the Arabians home, because he perceived that they did not warre as those that came to help him, but as they themselves pleased, wasting the countrey against his will, and so accompanied with his own army, he hastned against the enemies. But they without any fight, through Achiabus counsell, yeelded themselves to Varus. And he pardoned the common souldiers, and sent the Captaines to Cesar to answer the matter. Who pardoning most of them, yet punished some that were the Kings kinsmen (for some of them were akin to Herod) because they altogether rebelled against their King. Varus having thus quieted the estate of Judæa and Jerusalem, leaving the same legion that was there before, departed to Antiochia.

CHAP. III.

How the Jews had an Ethnarcha constituted over them.

NOW Archelaus had a new proceffe at Rome against the Jews, who before the sedition with the leave of Varus were gone to Rome to crave the liberty of their countrey. These who came as Embassadors in their countreys behalf, were fifty in number, and they were assisted by more then eight thousand Jews that lived at Rome. Wherefore Cesar called a Councell of the Nobility of Rome in the Temple of Apollo, which was situate upon mount Palatine, and joyned to Cesars private Palace, which was most sumptuously adorned: and the multitude of the Jews appeared with the Legats against Archelaus, and his friends. Archelaus kindred neither came with him, nor with the rest of the Jews: with him they would not joyne, for envie; and with the Jews they durst not, for shame. Amongst them also was Philip the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent in courteous maner to assist his brother; or if that it pleased Cesar to divide Herods kingdome amongst his children, that then he might have a part. The adversaries were commanded to shew what Herod had committed contrary to the laws: first of all they answered, that they found him not a king, but the most cruell tyrant that ever was, and that he murdered many, and those whom he left alive endured such misery, as they thought themselves far unhappier then those who were so butchered. For (said they) he was not onely contented to rear his subjects bodies with torments, but also defacing and ruinating the cities of his owne countrey, he adorned and reedified the cities of strangers: and permitted forrainers to massacre the Jews without revenge. And in stead of their ancient and wonted happinesse, and their laws inviolated, their countrey was by him made so poore, and so filled with iniquity, that within those few years that Herod reigned, they had sustained more murders and massacres then all their ancestors had, from the time of their departure out of Babylon, untill the beginning of his reign: being then provoked to take armes when Xerxes was King of Persia. Yet they by enduring such misery, being now accustomed thereunto, would willingly be subject to such a successor of his as they knew would make them live in most bitter servitude: for they, when Herod his father was dead, presently called Archelaus King, notwithstanding he was the sonne of such a tyrant, & with him mourned for the death of Herod, and offered sacrifice for the prosperity of his successor. But he to shew himself Herods son, began his reign with the slaughter of three thousand Citizens; and because he had so well deserved the kingdome, he offered so many men to God for sacrifice, and on a festivall day filled the Temple with so many dead bodies. Wherefore they who had escaped that massacre, had just occasion to consider their calamitie, and after the law of armes, to turne their faces to them who wounded them, and beseech the Romanes, that they would thinke the remnant of the Jews worthy of compassion, and not to abandon and expose the residue of their nation as a prey to them, by whom they should be most cruelly butchered: but that it might please them to adjoyne their countrey to the borders of Syria, and to let them be ruled by the Romanes, and so they should finde

A finde that the Jews, who now were accounted seditious and rebellious, under peaceable and quiet Governours, to be a peaceable nation: and with this petition the Jews ended their accusation. After this, Nicholaus stood up against them, and first of all acquitted the Kings of the crimes laid to their charge: and then reproved his countrey men, for that they would not be easily governed, and by their own nature would not, except they were forced, obey their King: and he also blamed the kinsmen of Archelaus, who joyned with his accusers. Cesar having heard what both parts could say, dismissed the Assembly. And within few daies after he gave Archelaus half of the kingdome, under the title of an Ethnarch, promising him moreover to make him King, if he behaved himself well: the other half he devided into two Tetrarchies and gave them to the rest of Herods sonnes: one unto Philip; the other unto Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the Crown. Antipas his part lay from Galilee beyond the river Jordan, the revenues whereof was two hundredth talents a yeer. And Philip had Batanæa and Trachon, and Auranitis, and part of Zeno his house neer Jamnia, the revenues whereof amounted to one hundredth talents a yeer. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchy Idumæa and all Judæa and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of their tribute, because they rebelled not with the rest. And these Cities were given him, over which he was Lord, Stratons tower, Sebastæ, Joppe and Jerusalem. The rest, Gaza, and Gadara, and Hippion, Cesar took from the Kingdome, and joyned them to Syria. Archelaus yeerly revenues amounted to foure hundredth talents a yeer. Cesar also (beside that which Herod left her) made Salome Lady of Jamnia, Azotus and Phasaelis, and the Palace at Ascalon, all which amounted to threescore talents a yeer. But Cesar made her house subject unto Archelaus his Ethnarchy. And having distributed unto the rest of Herods kinred that which in his testament he left them, he gave his two daughters that were virgins, over and above, five hundredth thousand drachmes of silver, and married them unto Phororas sonnes: and having divided Herods patrimony amongst them, he also distributed that which Herod bequeathed unto him, amounting unto a thousand talents, leaving himself onely some jewels of small value, which he reserved in honour and remembrance of the dead.

Of the false supposed ALEXANDER, and how he was taken.

At the same time a certaine young man, a Jew born, brought up by a Libertine of Rome in the town of Sidon, being very like unto Alexander whom Herod put to death, went to Rome, having one of his countrey men for his companion, who knew very well all the estate of the Kingdome: by whom he receiving instructions, affirmed, that they who should have put him and Aristobulus to death, being moved to compassion, let them goe, and took two others in their roome like them. With this tale he deceived many Jews living in Crete, where he was honourably received, and from thence he sailed to Melos, where he was yet entertained with greater pompe: and enriching himself, he used such means, that he got his hostes (which gave him entertainment) to saile with him to Rome: and after arriving at Dicæarchia, he received all manner of rich gifts of the Jews which dwelled there, and there by his fathers friends was honoured as a King. For he was so like unto Alexander, that they that had seen Alexander, and knew him well, would have sworn he had been Alexander. Wherefore all the Jews at Rome desired to see him, so that an infinite multitude followed him whithersoever he went in the streets, and they seduced upon him, that they carried him in a horselitter, and at their own proper cost and charges prepared for him a royall craine.

Who no sooner beheld him, but forthwith he perceived the difference betwixt them: and especially when he felt his hard flesh and servile shape, he presently understood the whole matter. But he was greatly moved with his bold speeches: for when they demanded of him what was become of Aristobulus, he answered, that he was alive; yet he upon purpose tarried behinde and lived in Cyprus, fearing some treason: for they being asunder could not so easily be entrapped. Celadus taking him apart from the rest of the company, told him that Cesar would save his life, if he did truly confesse, by whose counsell he fained himself to be Alexander. He accepting of this offer, followed him to Cesar; and declared himself to be a Jew,

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembered the discord past, and in revenge thereof he tyrannized not only over the Jews, but also over the Samaritanes: and in the ninth yeer of his reign, the Jews and Samaritanes sent Em-bassadors against him unto Cæsar: and finally he was banished and sent to Vienna, a Citie of Gallia, and all his patrimony was confiscate to Cæsar. Before he was summoned to appear before Cæsar, he reported that he had a marvellous dreame:
for he saw nine great eares full of corn devoured by oxen; and presently sending for Prophets and Chaldeans, he demanded what that dreame betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and some another: but one Simon an Essean told him that the eares of corn betokened yeers, and the oxen signified the changes and mutations of this world, for as much as in labouring the land, they turned up and alced it: and therefore he was to reign so many yeers as there were eares of corn in number; and then, after he had bidden many mutations, he should die. Five dayes after this interpretation, Archelaus was sent for to Rome, to answer that before Augustus, whereof he was accused. I also thought it worth rehearsing, to set down the dreame of his wife Glaphyra, daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was first married unto Alexander brother unto this man, and sonne to King Herod, by whom he was put to death, as we have said before: after whose death she was married to Iuba King of Lybia, and he being dead, she returned home to her father: and living in her widowhood at home with her father, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was so inflamed with her love, that presently being divorced from his wife Mariamme, he married her. Who shortly after she came into Judæa, dreamed that she saw Alexander her first husband standing before her, and saying unto her, It had been enough for thee to have married the King of Lybia: but thou not contented therewith, comest again to my house, greedy of a third husband; and which is worst of all, now married to mine own brother. I will not conceale nor dissemble this injury which thou doest me, but I will recover you against your will. And she scarcely li-are common.

After that Archelaus his dominions were made a Province, a certain Romane knight called Coponius was made Governour thereof, receiving authoritie from Cæsar to punish and put to death. In his time a Galilean named Simon incited his countrey men to revolt, reproving them for paying tribute to the Romanes, and for being subject to any mortall men, but God. This Simon was a Sophi-ster, having a sect of his own devising, nothing like other sects. For there are three sects of Philosophers amongst the Jews: one is that which the Pharisees do follow; another which the Sadduces do follow; the third is that which the Esseans follow, which is the most famous of the three. The Esseans are Jews born, but they are most friendly to one another, who beside all other pleasures do eschew witchcraft: neither do they suffer themselves to be led with their own affections, but account it a great vertue to abstaine from all vices and to keep chastitie. For they refuse marriage, and account other mens children, put to them to be taught whilst they be young, as their kinsmen, whom they do diligently instruct in their maners and opinions; not for that they condemn marriage and propagation of mankind, but for that they think men should avoide womens intemperance, for they think that none of them keep themselves truly to one man. Also they contemne riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongst them is richer then other. And they have a law amongst themselves, that whosoever will follow their sect, he must make his goods common

A common to them all: for so neither any amongst them shall seem abject for poverty, nor any great for riches sake, but they have as it were all equall patrimonies like brethren. They account it a shame to use oyle: and if any man against his will be anointed therewith, they use all diligence to wipe it away: for they account homelines best, and all their clothes are white. They have amongst them procurators, to oversee and use all things for their common benefit, and every one seeketh the good of all, who are chosen from among them by a common consent. They have not one certaine city, but are in many cities: and if any of their sect come unto them from another place, they give him any thing they have, as if he himself were owner thereof. And in brieft, they go boldly in to those, whom they never in their lives did see before, as though they were very familiarly acquainted with them: and therefore when they take a journey, they onely arme themselves against thieves, and carry nothing with them else. In every city there is one of them appointed, whose office is to have a care of the guests, and see that they neither want clothes nor any thing else necessary for them. All children under government, brought up by them, go apparelled alike, and they never change their apparell, nor shooes, except they have cleane worne their first apparell, or that by reason of long wearing they will do no more service. They among themselves neither buy nor sell: but every man that hath any thing that another wanteth, giveth him it, and taketh that of him which himself needeth: yet every one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom he pleaseth, without any change. Above all, towards God they are very religious: for before the sun rise they have no prophane talk, but they make certain vows and prayers after the custome of their countrey, as it were praying that it may rise upon them. After this, every one is dismissed to practise the art he knoweth: and when every one hath diligently laboured till five of the clock, they all gather themselves together again, and being covered with linen clothes, so they wash their bodies with cold water: and having thus purged themselves, they have a secret assembly, unto the which no man that is not of their sect is admitted: and so they come into the refectory as into a holy Temple, all sitting down with silence, and the baker setteth every man in order a loafe, and the cook every man a messe of pottage of one sort. Then before meat the Priest giveth thanks, and no man may tast any meat before they have made their prayers unto God. Likewise when dinner is ended, they pray again: for both before and after they give thanks unto God the giver of all, and then putting off that apparell as sacred, they apply themselves unto their worke till evening. This done, they do as before, causing their guests to sup with them, if by fortune any come. Their house is never troubled with cries or tumults, for every one is appointed to speak in his turn: so that they who are without the house, esteeme their silence as some sacred mystery. The cause hereof is their continuall sobrietie, and that every one is limited how much he should eat or drink. And although that in all other matters they are ruled by their Governour, yet in these two, to wit, compassionating and helping, they may do as they think good: for every one may when he pleaseth, help those whom he thinketh deserve help: and when they please, give meat to them that are in need. Yet may not they give any thing to their kindred without the leave of their Governour. These men give not place to anger, but refraine from wrath, keep their promise, and maintaine peace, and account every word they speak of more force, then if they had bound it with an oath: and they shun oathes worse then perjurie: for they esteeme him condemned for a lyer, who is not beleaved without he call God to witnesse. They studie diligently ancient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their writings, what is most convenient for the soule and the body. Out of them they learn remedies for diseases, and medicinable hearbs, and what is the proper effect of every stone. Those who are desirous to be of their order, do not straightway converse with them, but for a year before, they live out of their Colledge, and have the same diet, giving them also a little hatchet, and such a girdle, as is before spoken of, and a white garment. But at the yeers end, if they perceive him to be continent, then they take him into their refectory, and he is made partaker of purer waters (to the end he may continue chaste) yet is he not admitted in common amongst them: for two yeers after this his triall, they observe his life and manners: and at last, when he is thought worthy, then is he admitted to their common companie. And before he be received to the common table, first he protesteth with great and solempne oathes, that he will worship God, and observe justice and fidelity towards all men, and neither willingly hurt any man, nor injure any one for another mans command, but that he will alwaies hate the wicked, and assist the good, and ever keep his faith to all, but especially to his superiours. For no man can obtaine the power of principality, without the will and good pleasure of God: and that if he be put in authority over others, he never will abuse it to the prejudice of those that are under him, and neither exceed

ceed the rest in apparell, nor in any other ambitious pompe: that he will alwaies love the truth, and ever endeavour to confute liers: and that he will keep his hands from stealing, and his soul pure from all unjust gain: and that he will not conceal any mysteries, or secrets from his companions, nor reveal them to any strangers, although he should be thereto compelled by death. Adding moreover, that they will never deliver any doctrine, save that which they have received; and that they will avoid theft, and diligently keep the books of their doctrine, and the names of Angels. And with these oathes they try, and as it were arme those who enter into their order. Those of their congregation, who shall be condemned, they thrust out of their company: and whosoever is so punished, for the most part dieth a miserable death; for having once taken his oath, it is not lawfull for him to take meat of any stranger, so that feeding on grasse like beasts, at last he perisheth through famine. For which cause oftentimes they moved with compassion, receive many into their order againe, even ready by famine to yeeld up the ghost, judging them to have endured penance enough for their offences, who with famine were almost brought unto deaths doore. They are very severe, and just in their judgement; and to decide any matter, there is never fewer of them then a hundreth, and that which by them is agreed upon, is an irrevocable sentence. Next after God they reverence the lawmaker, insomuch as if one revile him, they forthwith condemne him to death. They greatly reverence old men, and a multitude: so that if ten of them sit together, no man of them must speak without he be licenced thereto by nine of the company. They also must not spee in the midst of the assembly, nor on the right hand. And they are more severe then any other Jews in observing the Sabbaths: and they do not onely abstaine from dressing meat that day, but also they may not remove any vessell out of his place, nor go to the privy. Vpon other daies they dig a pit a foot deep into the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before said) every one at his entrance into their order hath given him, and then covering themselves diligently with their garment, lest they should do injury to the light of heaven, in that pit they ease themselves; and then cover their ordure with the earth they took out of the pit: and this they do in most secret places.

And although this purging of their bodies be naturall, yet do they by washing purifie themselves after it, as after great uncleannesse. Furthermore they amongst themselves are divided into foure orders, according to the times which they have taken to follow this exercise of life; and they who are juniors, are so far different from the seniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they presently purifie themselves, as though they had been profaned by a stranger. They are long lived, so that most of them live a hundreth yeers, which I judge is by reason of their well ordered diet and their temperancy. They contemne adversity, and by counsell and discretion overcome torments. They preferre an honorable death before life. And the wars which the Jews made against the Romanes, shewed what courage and hardnesse they have in all things. For being then compelled by breaking of the members of their bodies, & fiery torments, and all kinde of tortures which were laid upon them, to revile their lawmaker, and to eat any meat forbidden: yet could they not be forced to any of these; neither would they intreat the torturers, nor shew any sorrow amidst their torments. Nay, in the very midst of their griefes and paines they scoffed at their tormenters; and laughing joyfully yeelded up their souls as though they hoped to receive them againe. For it is an opinion amongst them, that the body is corruptible, and that the matter thereof is not perpetuall: but yet the soules remaine for ever immortall; who passing out of a most pure and subtil aire, wrap themselves in bodies as in prisons, being as it were drawn thereunto by a naturall inclination. And when they are delivered out of these carnall bonds, then presently as freed from a long bondage, they joyfully mount a loft. And of the good soules they say, as did the Grecians, that they live beyond the Ocean seas in a place of pleasure; where they are never molested with raine, nor snow, nor heat, but have alwaies a sweet and pleasant aire coming out of the Ocean. But the wicked soules (as they say) go into a place very tempestuous, where there is alwaies as it were winter weather, alwaies full of lamentations of those, who for ever are to be punished. But I judge that the Greeks are of this opiniõ, when they say there is an Ile for the vertuous, whom they call Heroes and half-gods: and that the soules of the wicked go to a place in hell, whereas it is fained some to be tormented, as Sisyphus, Tantalus, Ixion, and Titius. Which they did first invent for this purpose, because those who are of good disposition, are made better in this life, by hope of some reward in the life to come: and the wicked are (as they thought) hereby restrained for feare of eternall torments, which if they continue in wickednesse they shall endure. This is the Essians Philosophy touching the immortality of the soule: wherein they propose an inevitable alluremant to those who have once tasted of their Philosophy. There are also some among them, who promise to foretell

A foretell things to come, who from their tender age have studied and followed holy books, divers purifications and sayings of the Prophets: and their divination seldome faileth.

There is another colledge of these Esscians agreeing with the former, both in apparell, meat, and kinde of life, and observe the same laws and ordinances; onely they differ in the opinion of marriage, affirming that they who abstaine from marriage, do cut of the greatest part of mans life, to wit, succession of mankinde. For (say they) if all men should follow that opinion, presently all mankinde would perish: yet notwithstanding these people are so content, that for three yeers space they make triall of the women they are to marry; and when they have proved them fit to beare children, then they marry them. None of them must lye with their wives when they are with childe, to shew that they do not marry to satisfie lust, but for to have children. When their wives wash themselves, they are covered with a garment as the men are: and this is the maner and custome of this sect. Of the two former sects, the Pharisees are said to be most skillfull in interpreting the law, and are of opinion that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate, and that every man may of his own power do good or ill, yet (say they) destiny helpeth in every action: and that the soules of men are all incorruptible but onely the soules of good men go into other bodies, and the soules of wicked men are sent into everlasting paine. But the Sadduces deny Fate and Destiny and affirme that God is the author of no evill, avowing likewise that a man hath free will to do well or ill, and every man may chuse whether he will be good or bad: and they generally deny both paines and rewards for the soules after this life. The Pharisees are sociable and loving one to another: but the Sadduces are at discord among themselves, living like savage beasts, and as uncourteous to their own sect as to strangers. This is all which I have to speak concerning the Philo sophers among the Jews. Now I will return to my purpose.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Cities which PHILIP and HEROD builded, and of PILATES government.

A RCHELAUS his Ethnarchie being now made a Province, the rest of his brethren, to wit, Philip and Herod who was surnamed Antipas, governed their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying left unto Julia by her Testament the Toparchie which she ruled, as also Jamnia and a ground set with palm trees in Phasaelis. When Tiberius Caesar after the death of Augustus was made Emperour of Rome, after that he had reigned seven and fifty yeers, six moneths, and two dayes, Herod and Philip remaining in their Tetrarchies, Philip builded a City neer unto the head of Jordan in the countrey of Paneade, and called it Casarea, and another he built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Julias: Herod in Galilee built the City called Tiberias, and another in Peræa on this side Jordan, which also he named Julias. Pilate being sent by Tiberius to be Governour over the Jews, caused in the night time the statua of Caesar to be brought into Jerusalem covered: which thing within three daies after caused a great tumult among the Jews, for they who beheld it, were astonished, and moved, as though now the law of their countrey were prophaned: for they hold it not lawfull for any picture or image to be brought into the City. At their lamentation, who were in the City, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the fields adjoyning, and they went presently to Pilate then at Casarea, beseeching him earnestly that the Images might be taken away out of Jerusalem, and that the lawes of their countrey might remaine inviolated. When Pilate denied their suite, they prostrated themselves before his house, and there remained lying upon their faces, for five dayes and nights never moving. Afterward Pilate sitting in his tribunall seat, was very carefull to call all the Jews together before him, as though there he would have given them an answer: when upon the sudden a company of armed souldiers (for so it was provided) compassed the Jews about with a triple rank: the Jews were hereat amazed, seeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told them, that except they would receive the Images of Caesar, he would kill them all, and to that end made a signe unto the souldiers to draw their swords. The Jews, as though they had agreed thereto, fell all down at once, and offered their naked necks to the stroke of the sword, crying out that they would rather lose their lives, then suffer their religion to be prophaned. Then Pilate admiring the constancy of the people in their religion, presently commanded the statues to be taken out of the City of Jerusalem.

this cause the people murmured, so that when Pilate came to Jerusalem, they flocked about his tribunall, crying and exclaiming. Pilate foreseeing that tumult, caused souldiers secretly armed to mingle themselves amongst the people in private apparell, and commanded them not to use their swords, but to beat those with clubs, whom they saw make such clamors. And when he had thus plotted the matter, sitting in his Tribunall, he gave a signe unto the souldiers, and presently the Jews were beaten: and many of them, partly with blowes, and partly trodden upon by the multitude, died miserably. The multitude amazed at the calamity of those that were slain, held their tongues. For this cause Agrippa sonne to Herod the Tetrarch, whose father Aristobulus Herod the King put to death, went to Rome, and accused him to Cesar. Tiberius not admitting his accusation, he remained still at Rome, and sought the favour of other Potentates there, and especially he revered Caius the sonne of Germanicus, he being yet a private person: and upon a certain day being with him at a banquet, he stretcht forth his hands, and openly began to beseech Almighty God that Tiberius Cesar might quickly die, that he might see him Lord of all the world. Tiberius having notice hereof by one of his familiar friends caused Agrippa to be imprisoned, where he endured a hard and streight imprisonment, untill the death of Tiberius, which was six moneths after. After he was dead (having reigned two and twentie years, six moneths, and three dayes) Caius Cesar who succeeded him in the Empire, freed him from prison, and gave him the Tetrarchie of Philip who was now deceased, and the Title of a King. When Agrippa came into his kingdome, Herod the Tetrarch began to envy his estate, and Herodias his wife still urged him forward to hope that he should be made a King: for (said she) thou wantest that dignity onely for slothfulnesse, because thou wouldest not go to Cesar: for if Agrippa be made a King, being before but a private man, how canst thou doubt to be made a King, who art already a Tetrarch? Herod herewith perswaded, went unto Caius Cesar, who greatly reproveth his avarice, in so much as he fled into Spaine; for Agrippa followed him to Rome to accuse him before Cesar: and Caius gave unto him Herods Tetrarchie. And so Herod remained in Spaine with his wife.

CHAP. IX.

Of the pride of CAIUS, and of PETRONIUS the President.

CAIUS Cesar so abused himself and his authority, that he would be thought to be a god, and be so called. Also he put many noble men of his countrey to death. He likewise extended his impiety even unto Judza: for he sent Petronius with an army to Jerusalem, commanding him to set his statues in the Temple, and if the Jews refused to receive them, that those who withstood him, he should put to the sword, and lead the rest away captive. Almighty God did otherwise dispose this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three legions, and many assistants out of Syria, came with all speed from Antiochia to Judza: many of the Jews would not beleve any warre towards, notwithstanding that they heard a generall report thereof: and they that beleved it, could not bethinke themselves of any meanes to resist. Suddenly all were in a great feare: for the army was now come to Ptolemais, which City is situate by the sea shore in Galilee, in a faire field, and on the East side it is compassed about with mountaines, distant from it threescore furlongs, which appertaine unto Galilee, on the South side it is inclosed with the Mount Carmel, which is an hundreth and twentie furlongs off from it: on the North side it is invironed with an exceeding high mountaine, which the inhabitants call the Tyrians ladder: this mountaine is an hundreth pases distant from the City. Two miles from this city there is a river running by, called Beles, a very little one, neer unto which is the sepulchre of Memnon, having adjoyning unto it a place of the compasse of an hundreth cubits, worthy of admiration. This place is as it were a round valley covered with sand like glasse, which when many ships coming together take away for ballace, so that they empty the place of it, that place is presently after covered with the like sand again. For there are windes, which as it were upon purpose carry this sand from the higher places round about it thither, and whatsoever is within the mine of metall there, it is presently changed into chrystal or glasse. And that which in my minde is more to be wondred at, is, that the sand being turned into glasse, if afterward any part thereof be cast upon the brinke of this place, it is againe turned into ordinary sand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Jews with their wives and children gathered themselves together in the field where the Citie Ptolemais is situate, and humbly besought Petronius, first not to violate their countrey

A countrey laws, and next, to be good unto them. Petronius, seeing the multitude of them who humbly sued unto them, and how earnestly they besought his favour, left his army and Casars statues at Prolemais, and himself went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias called all the Jews and their Nobilitie together, recounting to them the force of the Romane army, and Casars threatnings: adding moreover, that the Jews supplication was indeed a contumely, seeing all nations under the dominion of the Romanes (the Jews onely excepted) had already placed Casars statues in their temples among the rest of their gods: and herein they did as it were revolt from the Empire, and injure the President. They answered, it was against their laws and custome of their countrey: for it was not lawfull for them to have the Image of God, much lesse of a man; and that they were not onely forbidden by the law to have an image in the Temple, but also to have it in any other prophane place. Petronius suddenly answered: Well, I must do my Lords command: for if I do not, but spare you, I shall be justly punished: and not I, but he that sent me, will fight against you. For I my self, as well as you, must do as I am commanded. At these words the whole multitude cried out at once, that before they would see their religion violated, they would willingly suffer themselves to be destroyed. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius said, Are ye then prepared and minded to fight against Casar? The Jews answered, We every day offer sacrifices for Casar and the Romanes. But if Casar would needs place his image in their Temple, he must first offer their whole nation for sacrifice: for they would willingly with their wives and children offer themselves to any that would kill them. Hereat Petronius greatly marvelled, being moved to compassion when he beheld the constancy of the Jews in their religion, and so great a multitude prepared to die for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled onely the Nobility of the Jews, one by one, compelling them to accord to Casars command; and spake publikely to the people, sometime admonishing them, otherwhile threatening them, and putting them in minde of the power of the Romanes, and Casars indignation, and that he must of necessitie do as he was commanded. But they were moved by none of these. And Petronius fearing the ground would be left untilled (for it was now seed time, and all the people had remained idle in the Citie for fiftie dayes space) calling them together, he said, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger himself. For (said he) I will either (God working with me) appease Casars wrath, or else I will lose mine own life to save such a multitude as you are. And dismissing the people, who made daily prayers to God for him, he led the armie from Prolemais unto Antiochia, from whence he presently sent unto Casar in all hast, recounting unto him with how great an armie he went into Judæa, and that all the whole nation made supplication unto him: whose request and humble suit if he denyed, he must utterly destroy the men and their countrey; for they had constantly remained in their countrey religion, and vehemently resisted any new law. Caius writ an answer of these letters unto Petronius, threatening that it should cost him his life, because he made no more hast to execute his command. The messengers that brought these letters, were tossed in a tempest upon the Sea three whole moneths together: and others coming after them to bring news of Caius his death, had a prosperous winde, so Petronius received the letters of Caius Casars death twenty E and seven dayes before the other threatening letters came.

CHAP. V.

Of the Empire of CLAUDIUS, and of the reigne and death of AGRIPPA.

Caius Casar being slain by treason, when he had reigned three years & six moneths, Claudius was made Emperour by the armie which was at Rome. The Senate by the instigation of the Consuls Sentius Saturninus, and Pomponius the second, commanded three legions of souldiers to keep the Citie, during the Councell holden in the Capitoll: and for Caius Casars crueltie they determined to fight against Claudius, intending to reduce the Empire to the ancient government, that as before-time, so for ever after, those should rule that the Senate judged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent unto him, requesting him to come and be one of their Councell. Claudius also desired him to take part with the armie, intending to use his help where need required. Agrippa perceiving that Claudius was already as it were Emperour for his power, he took part with him: who presently sent him as Embassadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the souldiers, whether he would or no, set him in that dignity, and it had been in him an undiscreef part to have forsaken such an an offer at the souldiers hands, who did it for good will: nay, if he had refused it, his life should be in continuall danger, for it was sufficient cause of envy that he had been elected Emperour. Moreover, he purposed to rule, not as a Tyrant, but as a most milde Prince: for he would be contented onely with the title of an Emperour, and do nothing without the common consent of them all. And although he was not naturally inclined to modest and courteous behaviour, yet he had a sufficient example to beware that he abused not his authority, by Claudius Caesar's death. Agrippa bare his message to the Senate, who answered (as though they trusted to their souldiers and learned counsell) that they would not thrust themselves into wilfull bondage. Claudius receiving this answer, sent Agrippa again to tell them, that nothing could cause him to betray them, by whom he was made Emperour: and that he was forced to make warre against them, with whom he was very loath to strive, and therefore willed them to chuse a place out of the City for the battell to be fought in: for it stood with no reason to deface the City with civill warres and massacres for the obstinacie of some few. Agrippa did also this message to the Senate: and one of the souldiers that were for the Senate drew his sword, and said, Fellow souldiers, what should move us to massacre our friends and kindred, and parents, who follow Claudius? especially, seeing we have an Emperour with whom we can finde no fault, unto whom we should rather go forth with intreaties then with arms. When he had said this, he passed thorow the midst of the Court, and all the souldiers followed him.

The Senate, being thus left desolate, and the Lords abandoned of their force, began to be in great fear: and seeing it was no standing out for them, they followed the souldiers and went to Claudius. Before the Citie walls there met them some that endeavoured to shew themselves dutifull to Claudius for his fortune sake, having their swords drawn, and they almost killed five, before Cesar understood the outrage of the souldiers: and they had done it, had not Agrippa ranne and told him of the matter, saying, that if he did not presently appease the souldiers fury, now raging against the Citizens, all his Nobilitie would presently be extinguished, and he should be left an Emperour of a desolate place. When Claudius heard this, he repressed the souldiers fury, and very honourably received the Senate into his camp, and went forth presently with them, and offered sacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good estate of the Empire. Also, he presently made Agrippa King of all his fathers dominions, giving him likewise that which Augustus gave Herod, to wit, Trachonite and Auranite, and beside them another kingdome, called the kingdome of Lyfania, and published this his gift by an Edict unto the people, and commanded the Senate to engrave that donation in brazen Tables, and to place it in the Capitoll. Moreover, he rewarded his brother Herod, who was his kinsman, with the kingdome of Chalcis, and married him to the Queen Bernice. Agrippa received greater renewes of his kingdome then he could desire, which he spent not vainly, but in building such a wall about Jerusalem, as, had he finished it, the Romans could never have taken it: but before he could end that work, he died in Casarea, having reigned three years with the title of a King, and other three years before in the state of a Tetrarch. He left behinde him three daughters which he had by Cypris, Bernice, Mariamne and Drusilla, and one sonne by the same wife, named Agrippa: who, because he was very young, Claudius reduced the kingdome into a Province, and made Gestius Festus Governour thereof. But after him, Tiberius Alexander, who nothing violating the laws of the nation, ruled them in peace. After this, Herod King of Chalcis departed, leaving behinde him two sonnes, which he had by his brothers daughter Bernice, to wit, Bernicianus and Hircanus: and by his first wife Mariamne, Aristobulus. His other brother also, Aristobulus, died a private person, leaving one daughter, Iotapata. And these were the posteritie of Aristobulus, King Herod's sonne, and Herod had Alexander and Aristobulus by Mariamne, whom he put to death: but Alexander's posteritie reigned in the greater Armenia.

F T B the death of Herod, who reigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa the sonne of the former Agrippa King of Chalcis in his uncles kingdome: and Cumanus was made Ruler of the other Province after Alexander, under whom there were many tumults and new calamities, which befell the Jews. For when they were assembled together at the feast of unleavened bread in Jerusalem, the Roman souldiers

A diers standing in the porch of the Temple (for alwayes armed men kept that place upon festivall dayes, lest the people gathered together should make any tumult) one of the souldiers, taking up his coat, turned his bare buttocks against the Jews faces, speaking words as unseemly as was his gesture. Whereat the whole multitude began to murmur; so that they flocked about Cumanus, requesting him to punish the souldier for this misdemeanour: and some of them, rash young men, as it were prone to sedition, began to revile the souldiers, and threw stones at them. Then Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Jews would violently rush upon him, called unto him many armed souldiers, and sent them into the porch of the Temple. The Jews being in great fear fled and left the Temple, and there was such a throng, that as they rushed out to flee, above ten thousand people were preste and trodden to death: so that this festivall day was turned into wofull lamentations and mournings in every place. This calamity was increased afterward by a company of thieves: for neer Bethoron one Stephanus, servant unto Cesar, carried some household stuffe, which the thieves took from him in the high way. But Cumanus, sending for those in the villages next adjoyning, to make enquiry of these thieves, commanded them to be bound and brought unto him, because they had not taken the thieves: in one of which villages a certain souldier finding the book of the holy Scripture, cut it in pieces and burnt it. Hereupon the Jews gathered themselves together from all places, as though their religion were now violated: and drawn by the force of their superstition as with an engine, all of them at one call went to Cæsarea to Cumanus, there beseeching him, that the souldier, who had blasphemed God and their law, might not escape unpunished. But Cumanus perceived, the Jews would not be appeased without some satisfaction: wherefore he condemned the souldier to death, and sent him to execution before their faces, which done, they all departed.

At last there arose a tumult between the Galileans and Samaritanes, for at a village called Geman, situate in the great field of Samaria, a certain Galilean, of the number of the Jews that came to the feast, was slain: for which fact many Galileans ranne to fight with the Samaritanes: and the nobilitie of the countrey went unto Cumanus, requesting him, before any more harm were done, to go into Galilee, and punish the authors of this evill. But Cumanus, being busied in greater affairs, sent them away without granting their request. When this murder was known in Jerusalem, all the multitude left the solemnitie of the day, and went into Samaria without any guide, refusing to be restrained by the Nobilitie. Of this their tumult and sedition the sonne of Dinaus, called Eleazar, and one Alexander, were Captains; who with violence entring the borders of the countrey of Acrebatena, killed man, woman and childe, sparing no age, and burning the towns. When Cumanus heard this, he took a corner of horsemen, called the Sebastians, to come and help them that were thus oppressed; and so took and killed many of them who took part with Eleazar. Now the Nobles of Jerusalem came out to the rest of that multitude, which so wasted Samaria, clothed in sackcloth and ashes upon their heads, beseeching them not to seek revenge upon the Samaritanes, as thereby to move the Romanes to destroy Jerusalem, and to be mercifull to their countrey, the Temple, their wives and children, and and not at once hazard all; and overthrow their whole countrey and Nation in revenging the death of one Galilean. The Jews hereby were pacified, and departed. At the same time many conspired together to rob and steale (as most commonly people by long peace grow insolent) so that they robd in every part of the countrey, and they that were most strong and able, offered violence to those that were weaker. Then the Princes of Samaria went to Tyre, beseeching Numidius Quadratus, being Governour of Syria, to revenge them of those that so robbed and spoyled their countrey. There was also the nobilitie of the Jews, and Ionathas, the sonne of Ananus, who was high Priest, who defended the Jews against the Samaritanes accusations; affirming, the Samaritanes to have been cause of that tumult in killing the Galilean: and after, that Cumanus was cause of the rest of their calamities, who refused to punish the murderers. Quadratus for that time sent away both parties, promising them that when he came into their countries, he would diligently enquire of the matter: and coming from thence to Cæsarea, he crucified all those whom Cumanus took alive. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritanes complaints, and sent for eighteen men whom he understood for certain to have been in that broil, and beheaded them, and sent the two high Priests, Ionathas and Ananias, and his sonne Ananus, with some of the Nobility of the Jews to Cesar, and also the chief of the Samaritanes. He likewise commanded Cumanus and Celer the Tribune to go to Rome, and yeeld account unto Claudius for that which they had done in that countrey.

This done, he went from Lydda to Jerusalem: and finding there the multitude celebrating

Wherefore I will begin to recount what Nero did against the Jews. He made Aristobolus, Herods sonne, King of the lesser Armenia, and joyned unto Agrippas kingdome four cities, and the ground belonging unto them: two of them, Abila and Julias, were in the countrey of Peræa; the other, Tarichæa and Tiberias, were in Galilee: and he made Felix Governour over the rest of Judæa. This Felix took Eleazar, Captain of the theeves, after he had robbed and spoiled the countrey twenty yeers, and many more with him, and sent them bound to Cesar: and he crucified a great number of them, who either were theeves, and his confederates, or else such as assisted him. The countrey was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of theeves arose in Jerusalem, called Sicarii, with short swords, who at high noon in the midst of the Citie killed many in everie place: and especially at the celebrating of holy feasts they mixt themselves with the multitude, having short swords under their coats, and therewithall killed those to whom they bare any grudge; and when men fell down dead, they among the rest complained of this wickedness. By this deceitfull means they were a long time unsuspected and unknown. And first of all, they killed Jonathan the high Priest, and after him every day some were slain; and the Citie was put in a fear worse then death it self: for each man every moment expected death, as though it had been amidst open warres: likewise every one cast a diligent eye upon those that came neer him; also no man trusted his familiar friends: and yet were they murdered, whilest they were looking about them to escape danger. So cunningly did these theeves cover and conceal their actions. Moreover, there arose another sort of mischievous people, who did not so much harm with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsel more, and did no lesse trouble the quiet estate of the Citie then did the theeves. These people being vagabonds and jugglers, desiring alteration under pretence of religion, made the people as it were mad: for they went into the wilderness, affirming, that there God would shew them tokens of their libertie. Felix, perceiving that their action tended to rebellion, sent an army of horse and foot against these people, and killed a great many of them.

The theeves and Magicians work much mischief to many men.

But a certain Egyptian, a false prophet, caused a farre greater massacre among the Jews then that was: for being a Magician, he came into the countrey; and calling himself a prophet, he gathered unto him almost thirty thousand Jews, who were by his Magick arts seduced: and leading them from the wilderness to mount Olivet, he determined from thence to go to Jerusalem, and to drive back the forces of the Romanes, and to use his authoritie over the people. He had for his guard those that came to follow him. Felix, foreseeing his intent, met him with his legions of armed Romanes: whom the other Jews assisting, & fighting against him, the Egyptian with a few fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to prison, and the rest of the multitude dispersed themselves every one in his countrey. These being thus repressed, the other part (as it happeneth in a sick body) began to rise: for some of the Magicians, & the theeves being gathered together, they brought many unto misery, and as it were exhorted them to liberty, threatening present death to those that obeyed

A obeyed the Romanes; so that they forc't them who were contented with their subjection to the Romanes, to disobey them. These people being disperst all over the countrey, robbed and sacked Noblemens and rich mens houses: Moreover, kild them, and fired the villages, so that all Judaea was in extreame feare of them, and every day their crueltie increased.

At this time arose another tumult at Casarea, by a sedition raised between the Jews that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Jews challenged the Citie to be theirs, because it was founded by Herod, who was a Jew. But the Syrians denying not but that the builder of the Citie was a Jew, yet they affirmed that it belonged to the Gentiles: for (said they) it had not been lawfull for the Founder to have placed in it shrines and statues, if he had meant that it should have belonged to the Jews. So that hereupon there arose a great controversie among the

B Jews and Syrians, insomuch as the one fought against the other, and every day those that were the hardiest of both parts fought together. For the eldest sort of the Jews could not restraine those of their nation from being seditious: and the Greekes scorned to give place to the Jews. The Jews overcame them in riches and strength of body, and the Gracians overcame the Jews by help of souldiers: for a great company of the Romane army came thither out of Syria, and they were ready to assist the Syrians, because they were as it were of their kindred and consanguinitie. The captains of the souldiers endeavoured to appease the tumult, and took those that were most seditious on both parts, and beat them, and cast them in prison. But the punishment of those that were apprehended, terrified not the rest: nay, they were hereby made more seditious. When Felix saw this, by a streight Edict he banisht those who were most seditious, out of the Citie: and those that obeyed not, he sent souldiers and

C slew them, suffering their goods to be taken by the souldiers. The sedition being still on foot, he sent the Nobilitie on either part to Nero, to plead their right and title. Festus succeeded Felix, who diligently persecuted them that troubled the countrey; and destroyed many theeves.

CHAP. XIII.

of ALBINUS and FLORUS, Præsidents of Judaea.

D BUT Albinus, who succeeded Festus, followed not his steps: for there was no iniquitie so great wherein he was not plunged. Furthermore, he did not onely take away by force mens goods from them under colour of justice, and at his own pleasure exact a greater tribute, but also freed and let loose any one whom either the souldiers of the Citie took, or his predecessors had left in prison, so that their friends would give a piece of money: and they only, who were not able to give money, were imprisoned as most hainous offenders. At this time, they in Jerusalem that desired alteration, began to take courage; and those that were rich among them fed Albinus with money, to permit them to be seditious, and the common people that could not be in quiet, joyned themselves with Albinus favourites: and each of them had a troupe of theeves after him. But Albinus himself was over them all as a tyrant, and a prince of theeves; and he used the help of his guard to rob the meaner sort: so they, whose houses were sacked and spoyled, were glad to hold their peace; and they, who yet had escaped, were glad to be very officious towards those who deserved death, for feare they should suffer the like. In generall, no man could trust one another: there were then many tyrants, and from that time the seeds of captivitie, which after befell, began to take root.

E Notwithstanding that Albinus was of such behaviour, yet Gessius Florus, who succeeded him, so behaved himself, that in comparison of him, Albinus might have been thought a good Governour. For Albinus did all things secretly and craftily, but Gessius committed any iniquitie how great soever, so openly, as though he gloried in his impietie; and behaved himself, not as a ruler of the countrey, but as a hangman sent to execute malefactors; omitting no manner of theft, nor any means whereby he might afflict the people. Where he ought to have shewed pitie, there was he a tyrant; and where he ought to have been ashamed, there he shewed himself shamelesse. No man ever could invent more means to obscure truth, and devise more wayes to do harme then he: for it sufficed him not, for his own gaine to abuse men one by one at his pleasure, but he wasted and spoyled whole cities at once, and destroyed the people in great multitude. Nay, he was not ashamed by the publike voice of a cryer, to proclaime it thorow the whole countrey lawfull for any one that would, to rob and steale, so that they would bring him a part of their booty. In brief, his crueltie was such, that the countrey was almost left desolate, people forsaking their own native home, and fleeing into strange lands. And all the time that Gessius Gallus was Governour of Syria, no man durst goe to him to make any complaint against Florus. But when at the feast of unleavened bread Gallus came to Jerusalem, there met him a multitude of the Jews above 300000, all beseeching him to help and succour their afflicted countrey, and banish Florus, who was the very plague of their nation. Yet Florus was so impudent, that being with Gallus, and hearing these cries against him, he was no whit moved thereat, but laughed at it. Cestius for that time appeased the people, promising that hereafter he would make Florus more gentle unto them, and so returned to Antiochia. Florus conducted him to Caesarea to stop his mouth with lies, devising with himself how to make the Jews rebell, and that he thought was the safest means to cloake his villanies: for if they continued in peace and obedience, he feared, that some of them would accuse him before Cesar: marry, if he could make them revolt, then he hoped that their great fault would shadow his impieties. Wherefore to bring about his purpose, he every day oppressed them with new calamities, forcing them hereby to rebell against the Romanes. At this time the Gentiles of Caesarea got the victory over the Jews, and brought letters to testifie that decree before Nero. This was the beginning of the wars of the Jews, in the twelfth year of Nero his Empire, and the seventeenth of Agrippas reign, in the moneth of May.

Florus perjury and deceit toward the Jews.

FLORUS had no just cause for any of these calamities which he inflicted upon the Jews. The Jews dwelling at Caesarea, had a Synagogue neer a piece of ground that belonged to a Gentile dwelling in Caesarea. The Jews often sought to compound with him for that piece of ground, offering him farre more then it was worth: but the Landlord of the soile did not only contemne their request, but also to their great grief in that place built Tavernes; so that he left them a very streight and narrow passage to go to their Synagogue. Some young men among the Jews, being very zealous, resisted the workmen, and would not suffer them to build. Florus, hearing this, commanded the Jews to let the workmen go forward in their work. The Jews not knowing what to doe, especially one Iohn, a Publican, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building: he promised for that money to fulfill their request: and now having it, he presently departed from Caesarea, and went to Sebaſte without performing any thing, giving as it were occasion of sedition, and as though he had received money of the Nobilitie of the Jews to permit them to fight a certain time. The next day, which was the Jews Sabbath, when they were all assembled to goe to the Synagogue, one of Caesarea, a seditious person, took a great earthen vessell, and set it even at the entry into the Synagogue, and upon it did offer birds. This fact so moved the Jews, that they would not be pacified, because it was done in contempt of their religion, and thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Jews that was most modest and wisest, counſeld the Jews to complaine to them that were in authoritie: but those who for heat of youth were prone to sedition, began contumeliously to revile their adversaries. For the most seditious of the people of Caesarea were also prepared to fight with them, and had caused that to be done before the Synagogue, only to pick a quarrell, and so they fought together. Incendius, Generall of the horsemen, that was left to keep all in quiet, presently came with souldiers, and commanded that vessell to be taken away, and so endeavoured to appease the tumult: but not being able to do it through the violence of them of Caesarea; the Jews took the books of their laws, and retired themselves to a place called Narbat, belonging to them, which was distant from Caesarea threescore furlongs. Twelve of the chief of them, together with Iohn the Publican, went unto Florus, being at Sebaſte, to complain of the injury done unto them, requesting him to assist them, and modestly put him in minde of the eight talents they gave him. But he presently commanded them to be bound and imprisoned, because they had presumed to take and carry their law from Caesarea. Hereat those of Jerusalem were greatly moved, yet they shewed it not. Florus, as upon set purpose giving occasion of rebellion, sent for seventene talents out of the sacred treasury, pretending that it was to be employed in Casars affaires. At this the people was much troubled, calling and crying upon the name of Cesar, praying that he would deliver them from Florus his tyranny. Some of them being seditious, began to curse Florus bitterly, and took a basket, and carried it about, and begged an almes for Florus, which they did in derision, as who should say, he were as miserable as beggers that have nothing. Florus for all this, left not his avarice, but was more earnest to rob the inhabitants of their goods. So that when he should

of warre raised by Florus.

A should have gone to Caesarea to have quieted the sedition, and removed the cause of tumults, as also he had received money so to do, taking an army of horse and foot, he came to Jerusalem; that with the help of the Roman souldiers he might effect his pleasure, and terrifie the whole Citie.

The people to pacifie his wrath, went out in courteous sort to meet the army, shewing themselves ready to give them the best entertainment they could, and to receive Florus with all honour and reverence. Florus understanding of them, sent before him one Capito a Centurion, with fiftie horsemen, commanding them to depart, and not to mock him with a pretence of honour, whom they had so hainously abused. And that if they were as good as their words, they should flout and reproach him to his face; and not onely in words, but in

B deeds shew, that they desired libertie. Herewithall the multitude being terrified, and also that the horsemen that came with Capito assaulted them with violence, every one fled before they saluted Florus, or did their accustomed duty unto the army: and going every one unto his house, they past the watchfull night in fear and sorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the Kings palace. The next day he caused a tribunall openly to be placed, and the high Priest and all the chief of the Jews resorted thither and stood before the tribunall. Then Florus sitting in the tribunall seat, commanded them to bring forth presently all those, that had used any opprobrious words against him, threating to be revenged on them except they did it. The Jews made answer, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietnesse, requesting that they that had offended in words, might obtain pardon. For it was no marvell

C in so great a multitude, if there were some rash and foolish young men: and that it was impossible to discern all that offended, seeing every one was now penitent for that which was done, and at least for fear would deny it; and that if he were carefull to conserve and maintain the quietnesse of the nation, and preserve the citie still to obey the Romanes, he then must rather pardon a few seditious for so many good mens sake, then to revenge himself of a few wicked persons, to hurt and molest so many that thought no harm. Hereat Florus wrath was increased, and presently he commanded the souldiers to sack the market place (which was the higher part of the City) where things were sold, and put all they met or found unto the sword. The souldiers, who were desirous of gain, having now authority from their Ruler, did not onely sack the place they were sent unto, but also all houses, and murdered the inhabitants. All streets and gates were filled with them that sought to flee, and the dead bodies of them that did light into the souldiers hands: no sort of spoiling was omitted. They also apprehended many of the Nobilitie, and brought them to Florus: and he causing them to be whipt, afterward hanged them up. And there were slain that day, of men, women and children (for they spared not infants) six hundreth and thirtie. Which did not afflict the Jews so much, as to see the sudden crueltie and tyrannie of the Romanes; Florus then doing that none before durst ever presume to do: for he caused Knights before the tribunall seat to be whipped, and after hanged them up, who though they were Jews born, yet received they that dignitie from the Romanes.

Of another oppression of the Citizens of Jerusalem, by FLORUS his means.

E The same time King Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to entertain Alexander, whom Nero sent to be Ruler over Egypt; his sister Bernice in the mean while remained in Jerusalem, who seeing the cruelty of the souldiers, was much grieved: and often sent the Lieutenants of her horsemen and her own guard unto Florus, requesting him to abstain from the slaughter of the citizens. But he neither regarding the multitude of them that were slain, nor the dignitie of her that intreated, but onely his private gain, and what he could gather by oppression and rapine, denied her request: so that the rage of the souldiers extended it self also against the Queen. For they did not onely before her face beat and kill all that came in their way, but they had also killed her, had she not fled into the palace, where she watcht all night, keeping a trusty guard about her, fearing that the souldiers would break in upon her. She came to Jerusalem to fulfill her vow to God: for it is the custome, that if any be afflicted with grievous sicknesse, or be in any other distresse, they must abide in prayer thirty dayes before they offer sacrifice, and abstain from wine, and shave their hair; which custome Queen Bernice then observing, stood also barefoot before Florus his tribunall seat, to entreat him: whom he not onely contemned, but also put her in danger of her life. This was done the 16. day of May. The day after, the multitude gathered together in the upper part of the citie in the market place; and with great cries murmured that so many were slain, & especially used contumelious words against Florus: which the Nobility and high Priests (fearing their deaths) apprehended, beseeching them to abstain from such words as had already caused that calamitie in the city, and not to provoke Florus unto greater indignation. And so the multitude was pacified for their sakes who entreated, and hoped that hereafter Florus would desist from such cruelty. Florus, when he saw the multitude quieted, was sorry: and that he might again provoke them, he assembled together the Nobility and high Priests, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not seek alteration any more, if they would go in courteous wise and meet the souldiers which were coming from Caesarea, whereof were two legions. Having thus assembled the Jews together to go meet the souldiers, he also sent and commanded the Centurions not to salute the Jews, who came to meet them: and if therefore the Jews were offended, and gave any hard speeches, they should fall upon them with their weapons. The high Priests assembling the Jews together in the Temple, besought them to go, and solemnly to meet and entertain the souldiers, for fear of a greater inconvenience. Notwithstanding their counsell, those that were seditious, refused to do as they were requested: and others for grief of them that were slain, took part with the seditious.

Then all the Priests and Levites brought forth the holy vessels and ornaments of the Temple, and with Harps songs, and muscull instruments came before the multitude, beseeching them to endeavour, that the honour and pomp of the Temple might still remain, and not to incite the Romanes through contumelious words to sack the Temple. There might you see the chief of the high Priests with ashes upon their heads, and clothes rent, so that their naked breasts were perceived, and calling every Nobleman by his name, and speaking to all the multitude, requested them not for a small offence, to betray their whole countrey to them, who still gaped after the destruction thereof. For what commodity should the Romanes reap by the Jews salutation, and what amendment of their miseries could they expect, if they did not go to meet them? Contrariwise, if they would go to them in solemn sort, then they took from Florus all occasion of persecution, and saved their countrey from ruin, and themselves from further calamities. Adding that it was a great shame that such a multitude should be led away with a few seditious persons, and that it was more fit that so many should force those few seditious people to obey them, and joyn with them in opinion.

With these perswasions they did mollifie the malice of the Jews, and also perswade many of the seditious people, some with threats, and some with reverence of themselves to be pacified: And so they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Roman souldiers. And coming neer them they saluted them: who answering nothing again, those of the Jews that were seditious, began to rail against Florus, by whose consent this was done: and presently the souldiers apprehending them, did beat them with clubs, and the rest flying, the Roman horsemen pursued them, and trode upon them with their horses. Many were slain, by the Romanes, and more were killed in the throng, one of them tumbling upon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the Citie: for every one hastening and striving to get in, hindred themselves and others. Many died most miserably in that throng, and some were stifled, and some prest to death being trodden upon, so that their neighbors coming to bury them, could not know them. The souldiers also cruelly assailed them, killing all that they could come unto, and forced the people to go in by the entrance called Bezetha, who desired to recover the Temple and the Castle called Antonia.

Florus taking the souldiers with him, pursued them thither, striving to get the Castle, yet did he not prevail: for the people made resistance, and threw down stones from the house top, and killed many of the Romanes: who being overcome with darts cast from aloft, and could not resist the people, who on every side came against them, retired themselves unto the rest of the army at the Kings palace. Those that were seditious, fearing that Florus would again assault them, and by the Castle Antonia make an entrance into the Temple, they got upon the galleries that reached from the porch of the Temple unto Antonia, and beat them down, hereby to repress the covetousnesse of Florus, who greedily gaped after the sacred treasure, and strived to enter by Antonia into the Temple to take them: but seeing the porches beaten down, he offered no more violence. And calling together the high Priests and Nobilitie, he said that he was content to depart out of the Citie, but he would leave them as great a garrison as they would request. Whereunto they answered, that nothing should be altered, if he would leave one company to keep all quiet: so he left not that, which a while before did fight against the people, because that the people would not easily brook them, for that which they had suffered at their hands. So Florus as he requested, changing the garrison with the rest of the army departed to Caesarea.

CHAP. XVI.

Of POLITIANUS the Tribune, and how AGRIPPA made a speech unto the Jews, exhorting them to obey the Romanes.

The year of the world, 4030: after Christs Nativity, 68.

FLORUS yet devised another way to stirre the Jews to rebellion: for he reported unto Cestius that the Jews were revolted, impudently belying them to have committed that which indeed they endured at his hands. The nobles of Jerusalem and Bernice certified Cestius of all that Florus had done: he receiving letters from both parties, deliberated with his nobles what to do. Some counselled Cestius to go into Judaea with an army, and punish the Jews, if they were revolted; and if they were not, then to confirme them in their obedience. Yet it pleased him better to send some about him thither before, to bring him true news of their estate, and what had hapned. So he sent Politianus the tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa about Jamnia as he returned from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was sent. Where also were present the Priests and the chief of the Jews, to welcome Agrippa and having saluted him as courteously as they could, they presently bewayled the misery which had befallen their nation, and the crueltie of Florus. Which although Agrippa disallowed, yet made as if he were angry with the Jews whom he greatly pitied, purposing hereby to bridle their affections, that they, perswaded that they had had no injury, might abstain from revenge. So that all the better sort, who for their lands and livings desired quietnesse, well perceived that the Cestius Gallus, President of Syria consuleth with the Princes what were best to be done. Politianus is sent to Jerusalem, and meets with Agrippa.

C Kings reprehension was not of malice, but for their good.

The people of Jerusalem went out to meet them threescore furlongs off, and received Agrippa and Politianus very courteously, yet the women lamented the death of their husbands slaine, and with their teares moved the whole multitude to sorrow, who besought Agrippa to have compassion on their nation, entreating also Politianus to go into the Citie, and behold what Florus had done: And so they shewed him the market place desart, and the houses destroyed, and by the means of Agrippa perswaded Politianus to go round about the city as far as Siloa, onely with one man, and behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romanes in all things, and onely were enemies unto Florus who had used them so cruelly. Politianus having gone about the whole Citie, ascended into the Temple, well perceiving many arguments of the Jews fidelitie towards the Romanes: and calling the people there together, he praised their loyalty, and exhorted them still to continue in like obedience, and worshipped God and his rites, as farre as the law permitted him: and so he returned unto Cestius. The multitude of the Jews came to Agrippa and the high Priests, requesting them to send Embassadors against Florus unto Nero, and not to give an argument of rebellion by not complaining of such murders: for Florus would make him beleieve that they had rebelled, except they went unto him to shew that Florus gave first occasion; and it was certaine that the multitude would not be quieted, if any one hindered that Embassage. Hereupon Agrippa thought that it would be an hatefull matter to send Embassadors to Rome to accuse Florus and on the other part he perceived, that it was to no

Politianus assembles the people, and inciteth them to peace, and after returns to Cestius. The Jews require the king, that there might be some Embassadors sent to Rome to complain of Florus to Nero.

E purpose to contradict the Jews, who were ready now to rebell: wherefore calling the people together he made a speech unto them, and seated his sister Bernice in an eminent place in the house of the Asmonaens. The porch wherein he called them together, was in such a place that it overlookt all the higher part of the city, for there was onely a bridge between it and the temple, which joyned the Temple and it together, and there spake he unto the Jews in maner following: If I had perceived that you were bent to fight against the Romanes, or that the better part of the people were not inclined to peace, neither would I have come unto you, nor have presumed to have counselled you in any thing. For it is in vaine to give counsell of such things as are expedient, where all the auditors are already determined to follow that, which is contrary to the counsell given them. But for that some are ignorant what misery warres induce, because by reason of their young yeers they have not known it, others are moved with a rash and unadvised desire of their liberty, others are drawne by avarice and hope of gaine in that hurliburly, I thought it good to assemble you all together, and declare unto you what meanes is to be used to restrain such people, and that the good may the better know how to resist and overcome the practices of the wicked. But let no man frowne if he heare that which displeaseth him, and I will tell you nothing but that which seemeth expedient for you. For they that are so bent to rebellion, that they will not be recalled, may for all my words continue in the same minde still. And I will speak nothing at all, except you will all keep silence. I know that many do seek to aggravate the injuries that are done by the rulers of the countrey, and do highly commend and extoll liberty: yet before I begin to declare unto you who you are, and against whom ye purpose to beare armes, I will first divide and separate such causes as you think inseparable. For if you seek onely to revenge your selves upon those that have injured you, why do you then so extoll liberty? or if you think it not tolerable to obey any other; why then, these complaints against your rulers are superfluous. For although they were never so milde, still would subjection be intolerable.

Call all things to minde, and consider what a small cause of warre is given you. And first of all weigh with your selves the crimes and offences of your Rulers: for you ought to shew your selves humble, and dutifull to them that are in authority, and not exasperate, and provoke them to wrath by reproachfull speeches. For in reviling them for small offences, you do incite them against you whom you so revile: and that whereas before they did onely do you a little injury, and that secretly, now being moved through bad speeches, they openly set upon you and destroy you. And there is nothing that so restraineth cruelty as patience; so that oft-times the patience of them who have suffered injury, makes them that did the injury ashamed thereof. Be it so, that they, which are sent into the Provinces and appointed by the Romanes for your Governors, are irksome to you: yet all the Romanes do not oppresse you, nor Cesar, against whom you would take armes. For they command no cruell Governors to come to you, nor can they who are in the furthest part of the West, easily know what is done in the East, nor heare thereof. And truly it is a thing most against reason to take armes for so small a cause, especially, when they against whom you take armes, know nothing of the matter. It is an easie way quickly to have redresse for these matters you now complaine of. For there will not be alwaies the same Governour, and it is credible, that they who succeed this, will be more gentle and courteous. But if you once begin to make war, it is not easie to end it or sustaine it without great calamities. And let them who so thirst after liberty, diligently advise themselves, that they do not bring upon their backs a greater bondage. For slavery is a cruell thing, and it seemeth a lawfull cause to make warre, lest you be brought into it: yet he that is already in bondage and revolterth, is rather a perverse slave, then one who desireth liberty. You should therefore have endeavoured to have resisted the Romanes, when first Pompeius entred into this Land: but then our ancestors and their Kings farre exceeding you in riches, strength of body, and courage, were not able to withstand a small part of the Romane forces; and do you think who are their successors, and farre weaker then they, having succeeded them in subjection, that you are able to resist all the whole power of the Romanes?

The Athenians, who sometime to conserve the liberty of Greece, set their own citie on fire, and pursued that proud Xerxes whom they forced to flie with one ship (which Xerxes made the earth navigable, and the sea firme land, who had such a navy that the seas had not roome for one ship to saile by another, nor all Europe able to receive his army) who also had such a victory over Asia, neere the little Ile of Salamina, yet now are subject unto the Romanes, and that kingly citie is now ruled at the Romanes beck. The Lacedemonians also having gotten such a victorie upon the Thermopyles, and under the Generall Agesilaus sacked Asia, acknowledge now the Romanes for their Lords. The Macedonians also who still imagine they see Philip and Alexander promising them the Empire of the whole world, now patiently bear this change, and obey them whom fortune hath made their masters. Many other nations, who for their power and strength have farre more cause then you to seeke their libertie, yet patiently endure to serve the Romanes. But you onely think it a disgrace to obey them, who are Lords of the whole world. And where are the armies and armes that you trust in, or your navy to scowre the Romane seas? Where are your treasures to effect that you intend? Think you that you are to warre against the Egyptians or Arabians? And do you not consider the bounds of the Romane Empire? Do you not consider your own inability? Know ye not that your neighbour nations have often by force taken your Citie? and that the forces of the Romanes have passed thorow the whole world unconquered, and as it were searching for some thing greater then the world? Whose dominion towards the East is extended beyond Euphrates, and towards the North beyond Ister, and towards the South beyond the wilderness of Lybia, and towards the West beyond Gades, having found another world beyond the Ocean, and with an armie entred Britaine which is England and Scotland, where never any came before. Are you richer then the Frenchmen, stronger then the Germanes, wiser then the Greekes, and are you more in number then the whole world beside? What hope can you have that may incite you against the Romanes? But some of you will say, that bondage is a grievous thing. But how much more then you, should the Greekes thinke so, that were thought to be the noblest nation under heaven, and had such large dominions, and now obey the Romane governours? as also the Macedo-

Anians do, who have greater cause then you to seek their liberty? What shall I say of the fifty cities of Asia? do they not all obey one ruler, and the authority of the Consull, without any garrison? What shall I speak of the Eniochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Hellespontus, and Pontus, and about Maotis, who in times past had no ruler of their own nation, whom now three thousand souldiers keep in aw, and forty long Gallies keep now peaceably those seas, never failed on before? What think you, the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and those of Pamphilia, Lydia, and Cilicia, could say for their liberty, who notwithstanding now peaceably pay tribute unto the Romanes? What of the Thracians? whose countrey is five dayes journey in breadth, and seven in length, farre more hard and stronger then your countrey, where frost would hinder them that should assault them, yet do they obey two thousand Romanes, who are in garrison. After them the Illyrians, whose countrey reacheth unto Dalmatia, and Isther, are kept in obedience onely by two legions, with help of whom they also resist the Dacians. The Dalmatians themselves, who having so often attempted their own liberty, being oftentimes conquered, and still as their wealth increased, rebelling, are now in peace under one legion of the Romanes. Nay, if any one have cause to rebell, it is the Frenchmen, whose countrey is by nature of the place strong, being on the East side compassed with the Alpes, on the North with the River of Rhene, on the South with the Pyrenæan mountains, on the West with the Ocean. Who notwithstanding, having amongst them three hundreth and five nations, who have amongst them as it were the very fountain of felicitie, and with their goods and commodities enrich the whole world: yet do they pay tribute unto the Romanes, and account their happinesse to be builded upon the felicitie of the Romanes, and that neither for want of courage nor nobilitie of blood, who fourscore yeers long fought for their libertie, admiring the Romanes and fearing them, who still gained more by fortune, then they did by warres: and now obey a thousand and two hundreth souldiers, having almost against everie souldier a Citie.

Neither could the Spaniards, though gold grew in their countrey, keep themselves from being subject to the Romanes. Nor the Portugales and the warlike Cantabrians, for all the distance of sea and land between them and Rome. The Ocean, whose waves beating against the shoar, terrifieth the inhabitants adjoyning, could not stay them but they past it: and carried an army beyond the pillars of Hercules, and passed the tops of the Pyrenæan mountains, which reach unto the clouds, and so made all those people subject unto them: and for all that they were so warlike a nation, and so farre from Rome, they left onely one legion for garrison. Which of you have not heard of the multitude of the Germanes? whose vertue and mighty bodies I think you have often seen: For in every countrey the Romanes have them for captives: yet they whose countrey is so large, having hearts farre bigger then their bodies, and souls that contemne death, who are more cruell then brute beasts, yet are they now limited by the river Rhene, and kept in subjection by eight legions of Romanes: and those that were taken were made slaves, and the rest chose rather to save themselves by flight then fight. And you who have such confidence in the walls of Jerusalem, consider the walls of Britaine, whose countrey though compassed with the Ocean, and almost as great as our whole world, the Romanes sayling into it, have conquered, and four legions keep that Island so populous. What should I say more, when the Parthians, a most warlike people, who lately reigned over so many nations, and abound in so much wealth, are now compelled to send pledges to Rome? Nay, you may see all the Nobility of the East, at Rome, who with peace shadow their captivity; and almost all the nations under the Sunne trembling and dreading the Romane puissance: and will you onely warre against them? Do you not consider what befell the Carthaginians, who boasting themselves of that great Hannibal, sprung from the noble race of the Phoenicians, at last were destroyed by Scipio? Neither could the Cyrenæans, who took their beginning from the Lacedæmonians, nor all the race of the Maritidans, which extended as farre as the Desarts (which are very scarce of waters) nor the Syres, nor the Nafamonians, nor the Moors, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numidians, have been able to resist the power of the Romanes, who by force of arms have conquered the third part of the world, the nations whereof can hardly be numbred, which from the Sea Atlantick and Hercules pillars unto the Red sea, containeth an infinite company of Ethiopians, and innumerable habitations of them: who besides that they pay so much fruits and corn unto the Romanes, as for eight moneths in every yeer will keep and sustain all the people of Rome, do also pay tribute, and moreover assist them any way they can, and never murmur at it, as you do, and there is onely one legion left to keep them in obedience. But what should I need to tell you of forrain examples, to signifie unto you the power of the Ro-

manes, seeing you may well perceive it by that they did in Egypt, hard by: which reaching unto Ethiopia and rich Arabia, and bordering upon India, having under it seven hundredth and fifty millions of people, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria (which is ease to be counted, by the tribute which is paid of every person by the Poul) living in their countrey, yet disdain not to live under the dominion of the Romanes, notwithstanding, that they have a great enticement to rebell, to wit, Alexandria, which is both populous and very rich, in length thirtie furlongs, in breadth ten, and paies more tribute in a moneth, then you do in a whole yeer; and, besides their money, finde all Rome with corn four moneths in the yeer:

and it is on every side compassed about either with a waste wildernes, by which none can passe, or the fierce sea, which is boundlesse, or with great and strong rivers, or muddy and durty quagmires, and marsh-grounds: all which little availed them to withstand the force of the Romanes. For two legions onely placed in the City, keep all the great countrey Egypt, and the Nobility of Macedon in aw.

What associates will you have from some countrey not inhabited, to aid you against the Romanes? For all those that at this day dwell in any place of the world, that is inhabited, obey the Romanes. Except peradventure some of you hope for help from beyond Euphrates, thinking that your countrey men of Adiabena will help you: but they will not entangle themselves in these dangerous warres, for an unreasonable cause; or if they would consent to so dishonest a deed, the Parthians will not suffer them. For they are carefull to maintain their league with the Romanes, and would think it violated, if any under their dominions should warre against them. It remaineth then, that you must onely trust that God will help you; but God doth assist the Romanes: for it is impossible that such an Empire should continue without the help of God. Consider that this contempt of religion, although you were to warre against farre weaker then your selves, yet were it hard to be dispensed withall; and it may so come to passe, that that whereby you hope to make God your partaker, thereby you may make him your enemy: for if you observe the custome of Sabbathis, and in them do nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For so your ancestors have made experience by Pompeius, who ever deferred all his enterprizes untill that day, wherein his enemies were idle, and made no resistance. Now if in warre ye transgresse your countrey laws, I know not then for what you should rebell. For truly all of you at this time are of that minde, that your countrey laws will not be changed: And I pray you how will you request help at Gods hands, if wilfully ye break his laws? All that begin warre, either trust in humane riches, or divine succour: and they that warre, having no probabilitie to hope for any of these, wilfully lead themselves into open captivitie. What letteth you every man with his own hands to butcher his wife and children, and from consuming this goodly countrey with fire? for so you shall gain this, not to abide the shame of a conquest. It is good, O friends, it is good, whilest yet the ship is in the Haven, to foresee and provide for future tempests, and not then begin to fear, when you are amidst the waves and surges of the sea. They who fall into miserie not fore-seen, are worthie to receive compassion: but they that runne into wilfull calamitie, deserve no pitie, but reproach. Unlesse perhaps ye think that the Romanes will fight with you, as you will condition; and that if they overcome you, they will not use you hardly, nor fire and destroy this sacred Citie, and all the whole nation as they have done others. If ye be overcome, whoso escapeth unkilld, can have no place of refuge: for all nations either are already subject unto the Romanes, or fear that they shall be shortly. So that not onely you shall be in danger, but also all cities wherein any Jews remain. For there is no nation nor people in the whole world, among whom some of your countrey are not, who all shall be most cruelly put to death, if you rebell: and for the wicked counsell of a few men, all cities shall flow with blood of the Jews; and no man shall be punished for killing Jews, because of your offence. And if the Romanes do not execute all this outrage after your rebellion, then think how impious a thing it is, to rebell against so milde Governours. Take compassion, if not of your children, and wives, yet at the least of this City, which is the mother Citie of all your nation. Spare these holy wals, and sacred Temple, and keep unto your selves the law and sacred things of the Temple: assure your selves that if the Romanes again overcome you, they will not spare these things, seeing you were no more gratefull unto them, for preserving them before. I protest before God, your holy Temple, and all the Angels of heaven, and our whole countrey, that I have kept back no counsell, which I think profitable for you. Now if you consider of those things which are profitable for you, ye shall live with me in peace: but if you follow your private affections, I will not be partaker of the miseries, and dangers, you thrust your selves into. When he had thus spoken, he wept, his sister Bernice standing by him, and by his tears mitigated a great part of their fury. Then they cried that they

A they meant not to bear arms against the Romanes and Cesar, but against Florus, for the injury he had done them. To this, Agrippa answered, But your deeds shew that you fight against the Romanes: for you have not paid your tribute to Cesar, and you have burned the porches belonging unto Antonia; now if you would hide your rebellion, repair with speed the porches, and pay your tribute: for this fort belongeth not to Florus, nor the money. Herewith the people were content: and ascending into the Temple with Agrippa and Bernice, they began to reedifie the porches, and the Nobility and Captains gathered the tribute in every village, and quickly brought forty talents (for so much money was behinde.) And thus Agrippa appeased the beginning of these wars. After this, he began to perswade the people to obey Florus, till such time as another were sent to supply his place. Herewith the multitude was so moved, that they contumeliously reviled the King, and threw stones at him, and drave him out of the city. The King seeing that their sedition would not be quieted, complaining of the injurie done unto him, sent the Nobility and all the Potentates to Florus, who was at Cæsarea, that he might chuse whom he would amongst them to gather the tribute thorow the whole countrey. And so he departed into his own kingdome.

CHAP. XVII.

C AT this time, some of the chiefeft rebels, assembled together, suddenly assault a Castle called Massada, which at unawares they took, and killed all the Romanes, and in their places put a guard of their own company. In the Temple also, Eleazar, sonne of the high Priest Ananias, a bold and desperate young man, Captain of the souldiers, perswaded them who offered sacrifices, not to offer any, but those that were given by the Jews. And this was the ground and cause of the waris that ensued. For they rejected Cæsars sacrifices, that were wont to be offered for the good of the Romanes. And although the high Priests and people of account requested them not to omit that custome of sacrificing for their Kings and Governours, yet they refused so to dbe, trusting greatly to their faction: all the strength of the Citie that desired alteration, were of their mindes, and especially Eleazar, who at that time was Generall as is before said. Wherefore all the Potentates, high Priests, and chiefeft of the Pharisees assembled themselves, and perceiving into how great dangers those rebels brought the Citie, they determined to make triall of the courage of the seditious people: wherefore they assembled them together before the brazen gate, which was in the inner part of the Temple toward the East. And first of all, they greatly complained of their rash and unadvised rebellion, and that they sought to stirre up so great warres against their countrey, inveighing against the cause that moved them thereto, as being without reason: telling them that their ancestors for the most part, adorned the Temple with the gifts of Gentiles, never refusing the offerings of strangers, and not onely not to have refused their offerings (for that were an impious fact) but also placed in the Temple the gift that they sent, which were yet to be seen. And that now onely to provoke the Romanes to warre, and denounce it against them, they began to alter Religion: and beside other dangers also, to make the Citie seeme guilty of impiety, as though it were such a one, wherein none might offer sacrifice but Jews, nor any but they, adore God. If we should make such a law against any private person, he had just cause to accuse us of inhumanity. But now the Romanes were despised, and Cesar himselfe accounted prophane: and it was to be feared, that if the Jews disdained to accept of Cæsars offerings, Cesar would hinder them from offering any. And that the Citie of Jerusalem would presently be accounted as an enemy to the Empire, unlesse they presently accepted Cæsars sacrifice, and before such time as they heard these news against whom this outrage was attempted. And having thus spoken, they brought forth the most learned amongst the Priests, to recount from time to time how their ancestors had alwaies accepted of the sacrifices of strangers.

The Jews refuse Cæsars sacrifices for the prosperitie of the Romanes.

Against those who refuse forraie sacrifices.

But none of the rebels gave care unto any thing that was said, and the Levites came not to serve at the Altar, as now preparing for warre. When the Nobility saw that they could not appease this sedition, and that they themselves should first feeble the Romanes power, they devised all means to pacifie the tumult, and send some as Embassadors unto Florus, the chief whereof was Simon, the sonne of Ananias: other some were sent to Agrippa, of which the noblest was Saulus, Antipat and Cophon, who were also akinne unto the King, requesting them both to come with an army into the city, and suppress the sedition which was raised, before it went further. Florus was glad of these tidings, and desiring nothing more then war, gave no answer to the Embassadors. But Agrippa willing to spare both parts, as well the good as the rebels, and to preserve the Jews for the Romanes, and the Temple for the Jews, considering it not meet for him to busie himselfe in such affairs, sent 3000. horsemen to aide the people against the rebels. Which horsemen were of Auranitis, Bata-nara and Trachon, and made Darius their Caprain; and Philip, sonne of Isachim, Generall of all the army. These coming into the city, the Nobility, with the high Priests and the rest of the people that desired peace, received this succour in good part; and occupied the higher part of the city; for the rebels kept the lower part, and the Temple: so that they instantly fought with darts and slings, and shooting of arrows; and sometime one rushing upon another, suddenly they skirmished together. The seditious were more valiant, but the Kings souldiers were more skilfull in warres; who chiefly endeavoured to get the Temple, and expell out of it those who prophaned it. And the rebels with Eleazar endeavoured, beside that which they had already, to get also into their hands the higher part of the City. Wherefore, during the space of seven daies, there continued a great conflict betwixt them, and either part kept that they had. When the celebration of the feast came, called Xylophoria, where- in every one carrieth wood to the Temple, to keep a fire continually upon the Altar; the rebels would not suffer their enemies to doe their devotion.

None of the seditious gave care to those that were in authority. Embassadors sent to Florus and Agrippa against the sedition.

Now many of the theeves, who carried poyniards under their coats, went amongst the weaker multitude, & boldly followed their old practice. The kings souldiers were overcome, and forced to leave the higher part of the city: and the rebels presently coming in, set the Palaces of Ananias, Agrippa, and Bernice on fire, and forthwith went to the place where all charters were kept, purposing there to burn all bonds and obligations of debtors; thereby to defraud the creditors, and so to joyn all the debtors with their faction, and stir up all the poor people against the rich. But the keepers of these publike writings fleeing, the seditious persons set all on fire: and so having destroyed as it were the strength of the city, they addressed themselves against such as resisted their proceedings. Some of the high Priests & nobles hid themselves in vaults; others fleeing with the kings souldiers into the higher Palace of the king, soon lockt up the doors after them; amongst whom was Ananias the high Priest, and Ezechias his brother, & they who (as is before spoken) were sent Embassadors to Agrippa: and so the seditious were satisfied that day with the victory, & firing of the houses aforesaid.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of August, they assaulted the Castle Antonia: and besieging it two daies, they took all that guarded it and killed them; and placed in it a Garrison of their own company. This done, they went unto the Kings Palace, whither Agrippa souldiers were fled: and dividing their company into foure parts, they began to cast down the wals: none of them that were within durst come out for feare of the multitude, but went up to the turrets of the Palace, and killed all those that offered to come up, and many of the theeves under the wals, with things that they cast down. This conflict continued day and night; for the rebels thought that those which were within could not hold out for want of victuals: and they within thought that the seditious being wearied would soon give over. In the mean season, one Manahemus, the sonne of Indas of Galilee (that most crafty subtilt sophister, who reviled the Jews in Cyrenius time for paying tribute, and would be subject to any but to God) taking with him certain Nobles, went unto Massada, where King Herods armory was, and breaking into it, he armed the common people and other theeves, and having them for his guard, he returned again to Jerusalem as King: and when he was made Prince of that sedition, he disposed of the battery of the fortresses. But they wanted engines, neither could they openly undermine the wals of the adversaries, who continually cast down darts: wherefore, they began a myne a great way off, till it came under one of the towers which was supported by posts of wood, and they set fire on the wood supporting it, and went their way: so the supporters being consumed with fire, the tower presently fell down, and there appeared a very high wall within. For those within, perceiving their adversaries intent, perhaps by the shaking of that tower, presently builded this wall to keep out the rebels between them and it. The seditious, verily thinking that with the fall of the tower they should be victors, when they saw another wall were amazed. And the Kings souldiers were sent unto Manahemus, and others that were chief of the rebels, requesting them to have licence to depart. Which Manahemus onely granted to the Kings souldiers, and those of his own cuntry, who presently accepting thereof, departed, and so left the Romanes in great feare. For they were not able to resist so great a multitude, and they thought it a shame to intreat that they might depart, thinking that it were dangerous for them, although it were granted. Wherefore leaving the lower place which was called Stratopedon, because it might easily

A easily be taken, they fled into the Kings towers, whereof one was called Hippicos, the other Phaselus, the third Mariamme. The rebels that were with Manabemius brake presently into the lower part that the Romanes had forsaken, and kild all that they found there, and when they had sackt it, they set it on fire: And this was done the sixth day of September.

Of the death of ANANIAS, the high Priest, MANABEMIUS and the Romanes souldiers.

B He next day following, Ananias the high Priest was taken in one of the water Conduits of the Kings Palace, where he hid himselfe, and was there kild with his brother Ezechias by these theeves: and the Rebels besieged all the towers round about, and kept diligent watch, lest any of the Romanes should escape. But Manabemius, both for his good successe in destroying the strong holds, as also with the death of Ananias the high Priest, became proud and cruell: and thinking none so wise as himselfe, in those affairs, became an intolerable tyrant. Now two of Elezars companions rose up and communed together, that it did not become them that rebelled against the Romanes (onely to recover their libertie) that they should be traitors thereof to their own companions, who were of the same condition, and that they should indure a King or Lord over them, who although he be no severe man, yet he was of more abject and base condition then they. If it were so, that it were expedient to have one Ruler over all the rest, they had rather have any one then Manabemius: and being thus agreed, they set upon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pompe, apparelled like a King, and having about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Elezar his followers set upon Manabemius, the people did also throw stones at him, and so stoned him, hoping that by his death the sedition would be extinguished. The guard of Manabemius at first made some resistance; but when they perceived the whole multitude against them, every one shifted for himselfe as he could, and those that were taken were put to death, and they that escaped were afterward sought for: onely a few of them fled to Massada, amongst whom was Elezar, the sonne of Iairus, the son of Manabemius kinsman, and afterward in Massada became a tyrant. But Manabemius fled into a place called Ophias, where he basely hid himselfe: and being taken, he was drawn out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him all the Nobility that had assisted him, as also Abolomon, who was his onely helper. And in this matter (as I have said) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to have some end of that sedition. But the Rebels did not kill Manabemius, to the end to extinguish sedition, but to the intent to rob and spoile more freely.

The people with many intreaties besought them to let the Romanes alone, whom they did besiege, but they were so much the more earnest against them: till they being no longer able to make resistance, with the consent of Metilius their Captain, and some other of more authority, sent unto Elezar, requesting him to give them licence to depart with their lives, and leave their munition to the Jews. Who accepting their petition, sent unto them Gorion, the sonne of Nicodemus, and Ananias the Saducee, and Indas the sonne of Iamathas, to confirme the promise of their lives. Which done, Metilius led away the souldiers: and whilest the Romanes had their weapons, none of the Rebels durst attempt any of their treachery against them: but so soon as every one according to covenant laid down their shields and swords, and so departed mistrusting nothing, Elezars guard set upon them, and kild them, who neither made resistance, nor any entreaty for their lives, onely putting them in minde of their promise and oath. So they were all slain save only Metilius, who greatly intreated for his life, and promising that he would become a Jew in religion, and be circumcised, they spared him. Yet was this a small losse to the Romanes, who onely had then but a very few slain of their great and almost infinite army: and this seemed the very beginning of the Jews captivitie.

AT the same houre on the self-same day, it hapned, as it were by Gods providence, that the inhabitants of Casarea did massacre the Jews that dwelt among them, so that at one time above 20000. were slain, and not one Jew left alive in all Casarea. For those that escaped, Florus took, and brought them forth bound unto the people. After this massacre done at Casarea, the whole nation of the Jews waxed mad: and dividing themselves into companies, they wasted and destroyed in short time all the borders of Syria, and the cities thereabout, to wit, Philadelphia and Gebonitis, Gerasa, Tella and Scythopolis, and then they made incursion into Gadara, Hippon and Gaulanitis, pulling down some places, and firing other some. And from thence they marched towards Cedasa, a city of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaba and Casarea: and neither Sebaste, neither Ascalon could resist them, but they also were consumed with fire. Likewise they destroyed Anthedon, with Gaza, and most places adjoyning to these cities were sacked, to wit, the fields and villages, and a mighty slaughter was made of them that were taken in these places. The Syrians made as great a massacre of the Jews as this among them: for all the Jews inhabiting among them were murdered, not onely for an old grudge, but also for the avoiding of imminent danger. And all Syria was troubled in most grievous maner, and every citie was divided into two parts, and either parts safetie consisted in this, to prevent the other in murdering them first: the daies were spent in bloodshed, and the nights in fear, worse then death it self. For though they onely pretended to destroy the Jews, yet were they drawn to suspect other nations, that followed the Jews religion; and because they were as it were neutrers, the Syrians thought it not good to destroy them: and again, for their agreeing in religion with the Jews, they were constrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before seemed modest, were now through avarice incited to meddle in this murder, for every one took the goods of them that were slain, and carried them to other places as conquerours. And he was most renowned that had stolen most, as having also kild most. There might you see in every part of the city the dead bodies of all ages unburied, old men and children, and women lying in most shamefull maner, their secret parts being uncovered. Briefly, all the countrey was filled with exceeding great calamitie, and the fear of misery to come was unspeakable.

And these were the conflicts between the Jews and strangers. But afterwards making incursion upon the borders of Scythopolis, the Jews there dwelling were their enemies. For they conspiring with the citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their own commodity and securitie before their kinred and consanguinitie, joyned with the Gentiles against the Jews, who for all that, were suspected for their forwardnesse. Finally, the Scythopolites fearing that they would assault the City by night, and excuse their revolting by their great misery, they commanded all the Jews, that if they would shew themselves trusty unto the Gentiles, they with all their children should go into a wood hard by: who forthwith did as they were wil'd, suspecting nothing, and the Scythopolites were quiet for two daies after, and did nothing: But the third night they sent forth scouts to see what they were doing: who finding some of them asleep, and others not resisting, they surprized them in a moment, and killed them all, who were in number thirteen thousand, and afterward took their goods. I think it not amisse to speak of the death of Simon, who was the sonne of Saul, a man of regard: he was a man of great courage, and strength of body, both which he used to the great hurt of his own nation: for he daily killed many Jews, who dwelt neer unto Scythopolis, and he alone often scattered divers companies, and put whole armies to flight, who had an end worthy of his deeds, and murdering of his countremen. For when the Scythopolites had compassed the wood about, so that none could escape their hands, they killed the Jews in every part thereof. Simon drawing his sword, made no resistance to any of his enemies: for he saw that it was bootlesse to strive against such a multitude. Then pitifully crying out, I receive, O Scythopolites, a worthy reward for that which I have done, who to shew my fidelitie towards you, have kild so many of mine own countremen: and it is a just plague that a strange nation should be false to us, who impiously forsook our own brethren. I will doe therefore as a prophane person, killing my selfe with my own hands, and this death will be a sufficient punishment for my offences, and a full argument of my magnanimitie, that none of my enemies may boast of my death, nor insult over me. When he had thus said, he beheld all his family

A family with compassion and rage mixt together had a wife and children, and aged parents. And first taking his father by the haire of the head, stood upon him, and thrust him thorow; after him he killed his mother, who was willing to die; after them his wife and children, every one of them as it were offering their bodies to the sword, desirous to prevent the enemies. When he had slain all his kindred, himself remaining alive, he stretcht forth his arme that they might see what he would doe, and thrust his sword into his own body up to the hilts. A young man, who for his magnanimity and strength of bodie, was worthy to be pitied, had yet a just and deserved end for trusting fortaim nations.

After this so great a massacre of the Jews in Scythopolis, other cities also did rise against them, where they inhabited, and 2000. and 500. were slain at Ascalon, and 2000. at Ptolemais, and the Tyrians kild divers, and kept many in prison: Likewise, they of Gadara and Hippon slew the most valiant, and those of least courage they cast into prison. Also all other cities, who either feared or bated the Jews, rose up against them. Onely they of Antiochia, Sidonia and Apamia, spared them that dwell with them, and neither kild nor imprisoned any of them: perhaps they stood in no fear of them if they should have risen, because their city was so populous: yet I think they spared them onely for pity sake, because they saw they were quiet, and not seditious. The inhabitants also of Gerasa did no harme to the Jews amongst them: but when they desired to depart, they conducted them safely to the end of their borders. In the kingdome also of Agrippa much cruelty was shewed against the Jews: for he being gone to Cestius Gallus at Antiochia, left the rule of his countrey to one of his friends named Varus, kinsman to king Sobemus; and there came unto him 70. of the chief Nobility of the country Batanaea, requesting a garrison to repress those that should attempt rebellion amongst them. Varus sent certain of the Kings souldiers armed, and kild them all as they were coming to him. But he did this impiety without Agrippa his consent, onely for avarice: and as it were emboldned by this fact, he ruined the whole Realme, still continuing such cruelty and impiety against his nation, till such time as Agrippa understood thereof, who, for Sobemus sake, durst not put him to death, but dispossessed him of his place. In the mean while the Rebels took the fort called Cyprus, which is situate above Jericho, and after they had kild the garrison, they destroyed the fortresse. At the same time a multitude of Jews laid siege before the castle of Macheron, and perswaded the souldiers left in garrison, to yeeld the Castle: who, fearing that if they denied they should be compelled thereto, delivered it unto them; upon condition, that they might quietly depart: and they of Macherunt placed a strong guard within it.

CHAP. XXI.

How the Jews were slain at Alexandria.

The Citizens of Alexandria had alwaies a quarrell against the Jews that lived with them, since the time that that famous Alexander used their helpe against the Egyptians, and therefore permitted them to inhabit in Alexandria, and to have the same priviledges that the rest of the Citizens had. And this honour was also continued with them unto the time of the successors and heirs of Alexander: who also gave them a certain place in the City to dwell in, that there they might live more commodiously. The Gentiles having nothing to doe among them, permitted them also to call themselves Macedonians. And afterward, when Egypt was brought under the rule of the Romanes, neither Caesar, nor any one else, did diminish the Jews dignitie in that place which Alexander had given them. So that now there were daily conflicts between them and the Greeks: and although the Judges on both parts still punished them that were in fault, yet the sedition more and more encreased; and when all Cities else were filled with troubles, there the tumult was more vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people to determine of an Embassage to Nero, certain Jews mingled themselves amongst the Greeks, and so went into the Amphitheater: who being espied by their adversaries, the Greeks cried out, that the Jews were enemies, and came as spies, and so laid violent hands upon them. Some of them fled, onely three of them were taken by the Greeks, whom they drew to a place to burn them alive. All the Jews of the City came to succour them, and first they threw stones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ran in a rage into the Amphitheater, theater, and threatned to burn all the people there assembled: which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander Governor of the city had not appeased their fury, who did not at first use force of arms against them, but sent their nobility to perswade them to cease, and not to incite the Romanes army against them. But the seditious Jews refused this admonition, and mocked Tiberius: who seeing that they would not otherwise be appeased, sent two legions of armed Romanes against them which were in the City, and with them 5000. other souldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia to this massacre of the Jews: and Tiberius gave them charge not onely to kill them, but also to fire their houses, & take their goods. The souldiers presently went into the place called Delta (for there the Jews were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, and not without bloody victory. For the Jews, gathering themselves together, put those amongst them that were best armed in the forefront, who held out for a long time; but when they began to flee, they were massacred like beasts, and some of them were killed in the field, some were burned in their houses, the Romanes first taking what they found, neither sparing infants nor old men, but killing all ages. So that all that place flowed with blood, for there were slain 50000. Jews: and all the rest had been extinguished, had not Alexander (moved to compassion by their intreaties) commanded the souldiers to leave off; who being obedient unto him, presently departed: but the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawn from that massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceived against the Jews: and with much adoe were withheld from tyrannizing over the dead bodies. And this befell the Jews of Alexandria.

Of the massacre of the Jews by CESTIUS GALLUS.

Huge companies of the Romanes.

Cestius Gallus now thought it time to bestirre himself, forasmuch as the Jews were now hated every where: and taking with him the twelve whole legions out of Antiochia, 2000. chosen footmen, and foure companies of horsemen out of every one of the other legions; and with them the Kings forces that came to help him, to wit, 2000. horsemen of Antiochia, 3000. foot all bowmen, and 3000. footmen sent by Agrippa, a thousand horse, and 4000. which Sehemus brought, whereof the third part were horse, the rest foot, and for the most part bowmen; he went towards Ptolemais: and many joyned themselves to them out of every City, who, though they were not so skilfull in warre as the Romanes, yet their hatred was more then theirs. Agrippa himself was there with Cestius, being ruler of those he brought. There Cestius taking a part of the army, went to Zabulon (which is the strongest Citie of Galilee, called also Andron, and parts the borders of the Jews from Ptolemais) and when he found it desolate (for the inhabitants thereof fled into the mountains) who left it full of all riches; giving licence to the souldiers to sack it; he afterwards set it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof (for it was built like Tyre and Sidon, and Berytum) and after spoiled all the territories about it. Likewise, when he had burnt all the villages thereabout, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Beryth, staid still behinde to get booties: which when the Jews understood, and that Cestius was departed, they took courage, and came and set upon them, and kild of them 2000. In the mean while Cestius departed from Ptolemais, and went to Casarea, and sent part of his army to Joppe, commanding them to keep the town, if they could get it: and if the townsmen made any resistance, that then they should stay till he came with the rest of the army. Some of them went by sea, some by land, by which means they did easily take Joppe: so that the people thereof had neither time to flee, nor to prepare themselves to fight; and setting on them, they killed all men with their families: and thus sacking the town, they set it on fire, and there were slain 3000. and 40. In like maner he sent part of his horsemen to Narbatena in the Toparchy neer Samaria, who spoiled the countrey, kild a great number of the inhabitants, rob'd and burnt the villages, and carried away a great booty with them.

Of CESTIUS his battell against Ierusalem.

Sephoris and other cities of Galilee doe friendly entertain the Romanes.

HE sent also Casennius Gallus, Generall of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, and gave him as great an army as he thought sufficient to conquer that nation, whom the strongest Citie of Galilee called Sephoris courteously entertained, and other cities followed their ex-ample.

A example. They that were seditious and gave themselves to robbing, fled into the mountain which is situate in the midst of Galilee against Sephoris, called Asamon: these Gallus incotred with his army; who, so long as they kept the higher part of the mountain, easily resisted the Romanes, and killed above 200. of them: but when they saw the Romanes had occupied a higher place then that wherein they kept, they easily were overcome: for not being armed, they could not stand out, and if they should have fled, they could not have escaped the horsemen, so that onely a few hid themselves in difficult places, and above 2000. of them were slain. Gallus perceiving all Galilee in peace, and not minded to revolt, returned with his companies unto Cæsarea, and Cestius with his whole army went to Antipatris: where understanding that a great company of Jews were gathered together in the tower called Aphecy, he sent some before to skirmish with them: but the Jews would not abide battell, and the souldiers burned their tents, and the villages adjoyning. Cestius went from thence to Lydda, and found the citie desolate, for all the people were gone unto Jerusalem, because of the feast of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fittie persons whom he found there, he fired the town, and went no further: and going by Bethoron, he pitched his tent in Gabaus, which is fifty furlongs distant from Jerusalem. When the Jews saw themselves in danger, they left the solemnitie, and prepared themselves for warre: and having a great multitude, they went to fight, observing no order, altogether with indiscreet cries, not regarding the Sabbath, which they hold in great estimation: and the same fury, that made them leave their devotion, made them also victorious in that battell; for they assaulted the Romanes with such a courage, that they brake their battell array: and killing all that resisted, they pressed into the midst thereof: and if a fresh supply both of horse and foot had not come in time, all Cestius army had been in great danger. So that there were slain five hundred and fifty Roman souldiers, and foure hundred of them were foot, and the rest were horsemen, but of the Jews but two and twenty. The most valiant in this combat were Monobazus and Cenedaus, kinsment to King Monobazus of Adiabena, and next to them Parades Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who fled unto the Jews from King Agrippa, whom he had lately served: and so the Jews being repulsed, returned into Jerusalem; and Simon the sonne of Giora invaded the Romanes, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and slew many of the rereward, and took many carts, and much baggage withall, which he brought into the city. Cestius staid three daies in the field, and the Jews kept the high places, espying which way he went, purposing not to be quiet if the Romanes departed.

Of the siege of Jerusalem by Cestius, and of the massacre.

Agrippa perceiving the Romanes to be in great danger, for that all the mountains were covered with infinite numbers of the Jews, he purposed to trie, if through few words he could perswade them to desist from war; or if any refused, to receive those that were willing. Wherefore he sent unto them Borcus and Phæbus, whom they well knew, assuring and promising them pardon from Cestius, and from the Romanes, of all that they had already done, if they would now lay down their arms, and joyn with them. But the rebels fearing that all the multitude, in hope of safety, would joyn with Agrippa, determined to kill the Legats, and slew Phæbus before he spake any word, and Borcus being wounded, escaped. But the people were angry hereat, and with stones and clubs drave them into the town that were the authors of this fact. Cestius perceiving them at odds amongst themselves, thought that he had now a fit opportunitie to assault them, and so came upon them with his whole army: and putting them to flight he pursued them unto Jerusalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, he departed seven furlongs from the city, and did nothing against the city for three daies space; perhaps hoping that they within would relent: and then sending a great many souldiers into the villages adjoyning to fetch corn, the fourth day, which was the thirtieth of October, he came against the city with his army in battell array. The people of the Jews were kept in awe by the rebels, who terrified by the Roman discipline, forsook the outmost parts of the city, and fled into the innermost part of the Temple. Cestius passing Betheza, burned Cenopolis and the new market place, and coming unto the higher part of the city, he pitched his tent neer the Kings Palace: and if at that time he had violently issued in at the wals, he had taken the city and ended the wars. But Tyrannus Priscus Generall of the footmen, and many other rulers and captains of the horsemen, being hired with money by Florus, hindred that his purpose, whereby the warres were so prolonged, and a thousand calamities befell the Jews. In the mean time many of the chiefeft among the Jews, and Ananias the fonne of Iona- thas, called Cestius, as though they would have opened him the gates: but he was angry and scarce trusted them, till at last they delaid the time so long, that the rebels perceived this treason, and cast Ananias down the wall, and with stones drave his complices into their houses. Which done, they retired themselves into the towers, from whence they beat back those that scaled the wals. The Romanes for five daies space assaulted the walles on every side, but all in vain; and the sixth day, Cestius with many chosen souldiers and Bowmen affaulted the Temple on the North side. The Jews valiantly made resistance out of the porches, and often repulsed the Romanes approaching the wals: yet at last they, with the multitude of their adversaries darts, were forced to give back. Then the Romans that went before, having their shields upon their heads, leaned against the wall, and they in the second place held their shields against theirs in the first, and so in order untill the last, thereby making as it were a covering as the Romanes call it, or defence, that all their shot and darts could do them no harme; so that the souldiers did safely undermine the wals, and attempted to fire the gates of the Temple.

Now the seditious people were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the City, as though it would presently be taken. And the good were hereby encouraged, as much as the rebels were dismaied, and came unto the gates to open unto Cestius, who had well deserved at their hands. And truly if he had but a little longer continued the siege, he had taken the city. But I think that God being angry with the wicked, would not suffer the wars to be ended at that time: for Cestius neither regarding the good-will of the people, nor the desperation of the rebels, removed his army from thence; and having received no losse, very unadvisedly departed from the City: at whose unlooked for flight, the rebels took heart; and making after him, they killed the horsemen and footmen that came last. And then Cestius went to the Tents which he had fortified in Scopion. The next day he went further into the countrey; whereby he more encouraged the rebels, who following him, killed many of his rereward. Afterward, either end of the army being well strengthened, the Jews assaulted them that were behinde, and the last durst not cast any darts against them, who wounded them on their backs, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them; and they were not able to resist them that assaulted them on each side, being as it were heaveie, and not daring to break their order; on the contrary, seeing the Jews so active and apt to skip to and fro: so that the Romanes endured much harme at the hands of their enemies, and did them none; and thus were they beaten all the way along, and many of them killed, amongst whom was Priscus Captain of the sixth legion, and Longinus the tribune, and Aemilius Lucandus Captain of a troupe of horsemen. And so with much adoe, they came unto Gabio; where they first pitcht their tents; casting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them.
Cestius staid there two daies, doubtfull what to doe: the third day he perceived his enemies to be increased, and all places about to be filled with Jews: whereby he saw that his stay was to his disadvantage, and the number of his enemies would still increase, if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flye speedily, he caused the souldiers to cast away all those things that might any way be a hindrance unto them, and killed their Mules and Asses, and cattell, saving onely those that bare munition; fearing that if he should not destroy them, the Jews might make use of them against him, and so he led the army toward Bethoron. The Jews in large passages little molested his army: but when they were to passe a streight, then they killed them of the rereward, and thrust other some down into the valley, and all the army of the Jews were spred upon the eminent places, whereby the army was to passe, expecting to welcome them with their arrows. Where the footmen amazed, and bethinking how to help themselves, the horsemen were brought into great danger: for they could not keep their ranks for darts and arrows, neither could they go to hurt their enemies, the ascent unto the top of the mountains was so steep: and they were compassed on each side with rocks and deep valleies, so that if any went out of the way, he fell down and was killed, in so much as there was no way to flye nor to resist. Now not knowing what to doe, they began to weep, and crie out as men in desperation: and the Jews answered them with an encouraging one another to play the men; being glad of their enemies adversitie, and cruelly bent against them: and all the army of Cestius had there perished, had not the night come on and helped them, which by her darknesse gave leasure to the Romanes to flye into Bethoron. In the mean while, the Jews kept all the places thereabouts besieged, and guarded the passages. Cestius seeing it not possible to march openly, thought it best to flye, and chose almost 400. of his strongest souldiers, and set them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they should cry as they did before, that the Jews might think that
 the

A the whole army was there, and so he with the rest of his army marched quietly 30. furlongs. In the morning the Jews perceiving the Romanes to be fled, assaulted the 400. whereby they were deceived, and presently killing them with darts, forthwith they followed Cestius: who having fled a great way in the night, made more haste the next day, so that the souldiers for fear left their arms and instruments to beat down the wals, and slings, and much other munition; which the Jews taking, after used against them. And thus they followed the Romanes unto Antipatris: and seeing they could not overtake them, they returned, bringing with them the warlike instruments, and rifling those that were slain, and taking whatsoever the Romanes had left behinde; and so singing songs of victory, they returned unto Jerusalem, having lost very few of their company, and slain 5000. and 300. and 80. of the footmen of the Romanes, and their helpers, and 900. and 80. horsemen. And this was done upon the eighth day of October, and in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the crueltie of those of Damascus against the Jews, and of JOSEPHS affairs in Galilee.

C Ncontinently after Cestius adverse fortune, many of the chiefeft amongst the Jews daily fled and forsook the City, as a ship presently ready to sink. Costobarus and Saul two brethren, and Philip the son of Ioachim Generall of Agrippas army, fled out of the Citie and yeelded themselves unto Cestius. As for Antipas, who was also besieged with them in the Kings Palace, he would not flie with the rest, and so was killed by the Rebels. But Cestius sent Saul & the rest of his company into Achaia unto Nero, to let him understand the cause of their flight, and to shew how Florus had caused all these wars: for so he hoped that Nero would bend his wrath against Florus, and quit him from danger. Then the people of Damascus understanding the death of the Romanes, devised how to destroy the Jews which inhabited amongst them: and they thought it was easie to be accomplished, for that the Jews were already assembled in the common baths, for fear of some such matter: yet they mistrusted their women, who all, except a few, were Jews in religion. Wherefore they took great heed to conceale their intent from them: and so assaulting the Jews altogether in a narrow place, and having nothing to defend them, they put them all to the sword, who were in number ten thousand. The Rebels that so pursued Cestius, returned into Jerusalem, and ceased not to joyn all unto them that favoured the Romanes, either by force or by flattery: and assembling themselves in the Temple, they determined to choose a greater number of Captains. Wherefore Ioseph the son of Gorion, and Ananias the high Priest were appointed rulers of the city, & especially to see the wals thereof repaired. Eleazar the son of Simon was put in no authoritie, notwithstanding that he had in his custodie all preys and spoiles taken from the Romanes, and Cestius his money, and a great part of the publike treasure, because they perceived him through authoritie to wax proud, and his attendants become stately. Yet in time Eleazar by money and craft, perswaded the people to obey him in all things. And they requested other Captains to be sent into Idumaea, who were Iesus the son of Sapphas, and Eleazar the sonne of the new high Priest: and they commanded Niger who was born beyond Jordan, to obey these Captains; who was therefore called Perasides, and was then Governour of Idumaea. And they neglected not to do the like by other regions: for Ioseph the son of Simon was sent to Jericho and Manasses beyond the river, and John the Esslean to Tamna, every one to rule the government of his countrey as a Toparchy. Lydda, Joppe, and Ammaus, were annexed to John the Esslean, and John the son of Ananias was appointed Governour of Gophnitis and Acrabateha. And Ioseph the son of Matthias was made Ruler over both Galilees, unto which was joyned Gamala the strongest City in that coast.

As for other Governours, every one discharged his place according to his wisdom and dexterity. When Ioseph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his first care was to get the good will of the inhabitants, knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he had offended. Then considering that he should have most mightie and assured friends, if he made them partakers of his authoritie; and likewise get the love of the common people, if he did esteeme of those things which they should think well of; He chose seventy of the most ancientest wise men amongst them, and made them rulers over all Galilee, and elected seven Judges over the lesser towns to judge inferiour matters: for he reserved all great affairs and criminall causes to his own hearing. Moreover, having ordained a forme of justice that those seventie should follow, he took counsell how to work G their outward securitie: And being assured that the Romanes would come into Galilee, he compassed those places with strong wals that were fit for his purpose, to wit, Jotapata, Bersabea, Selamis, Perea, Japha, and Sigoph, with the mountain Itaburium, Tarichea, and Tiberias. Moreover, he fortified the caves neer the lake Genesar, which is in lower Galilee, and in high Galilee Petra, which is also called Achaberon and Seph, Jamnith, and Mero; in Gaulanitis also Seleucia, and Soganes, and Gamala: he onely permitted them of Sephoris to build their own wals, because he perceived them to be rich and prone to war of themselves. Likewise John the son of Leuias, at Iosephs command, built the wall of Giscala himself alone: but in all other places that were fortified, Ioseph put to his helping hand, and told how they should be done. He levied also an army of an hundred thousand, who were all young men, whom he armed with old armour, which he gathered from all parts of the countrey: and considering that the Romane army was invincible, for that they were all obedient unto their rulers, and expert in war, he could not instruct them in martiall discipline, other occasions forcing him to the contrary: but calling to minde that the multitude of rulers made obedience, he ordained many captains, and constituted divers sorts of souldiers, as the Romanes used to do; making some governors of ten, other some over a hundred, and others over a thousand; and appointed likewise rulers over them. He taught them also how to give the sign of warre, and how to sound the trumpet both to call them to combate, and to retire: how to march in length, and cast in a ring, and alwaies to succour them that were most in danger: and to be short, he taught them whatsoever might either encourage them, or make them active: but especially he exercised them in feats of arms, imitating in particular the order of the Romanes, often telling them that they were to fight with men, who for strength of body and courage passed all nations of the world. Also he told them that hereby he should perceive whether they would be obedient in war, if now they abstained from such things as were usual to souldiers, to wit, robbing and spoiling their countrey men, and crafty and deceitfull dealing; nor think the spoile of those with whom they conversed, to be their own gain: for those wars had alwaies best successe, where the souldiers carried good consciences, and they that were bad, should not onely have men, but God also for their enemy. And after this manner he daily exhorted them, and now he had appointed how many were to fight. For 6000. footmen, and 200, and 50. horsemen, and beside these 4000. and 500. whom he hired, were alwaies in readinesse, and 600. chosen men to guard his own person. And the hirelings onely excepted, the rest of the souldiers were provided for by the cities: for every city before mentioned, sent one halfe of their men for souldiers, and the other halfe they kept to provide victuals for them, that one part being employed in war, the other might do such business as the city required.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of JOSEPHS danger and escape, and of the malice of JOHN of Giscala.

John a notable dissembler, and a thirsty murderier under hope of gain.

Whilest Ioseph thus ordered the estate of Galilee, there arose a traitor born in Giscala, the son of Leuias, whose name was John, a most subtil & deceitful treacher, who by vile means was now become the richest man in that countrey, being before very poore; whereby for a while he was hindered from putting his villanies in practice: who could lie at his pleasure and easily give credit unto lies, who thought deceit to be a vertue, which he used even towards his dearest friends; and a great counterfeiter of humanity: yet for the hope of gain became a cruell murderier. He alwaies aimed at high matters, with an aspiring minde, and at first nourished his hope with small villanies. For first he was a thiefe after his own manner, and lived in woods and solitarie places: at last he got him a company of audacious people like to himself, at first small, but afterward he greatly increased it. He also had a great care to choose no idle persons, but such as were strong of body, valiant of minde, and skilfull in martiall affairs: of these he gathered foure hundred, the most of them out of Tyre, and the villages thereabout: and with them he wasted all Galilee, and put many in minde of the miserable wars to come. This man a long time before desired to be Governour of the army: and aspired to greater matters, onely the want of money hindered him: and perceiving that Ioseph took delight in his industry, he perswaded him to suffer him to build the wals of that place where he was born, which was now desolate; and to accomplish this, he gathered great sums of money of the richer sort. Then he devised another shift: for having perswaded the Jews that were dispersed over all Syria, that

A that they should use no oyle, save onely that which was made by their own nation, he caused divers vessels of oyle to be brought unto the confines of Galilee, and buying foure barrells for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted unto foure Attique groates) he sold them again unto the Syrian Jews, the halfe of one barrell for as much as all foure cost him. And for that Galilee abounded with oyles, and especially at that time, he conveyed it to such places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himself. By this means he gathered an infinite masse of money, which presently he turned to his prejudice who had given him licence so to get it. And thinking that if he could depose Ioseph, that then he might come to be ruler over Galilee, he commanded his followers to robbe and spoile more then they did before, and so to trouble the countrey, that he might either kill the Governour, if he sought to redresse it, at unawares; or if he let all alone, to accuse him of cowardice to the people for so doing. Moreover, he had already given out speeches, that Ioseph went about to betray Galilee to the Romanes, and devised many things to this effect to work Iosephs overthrow. It hapned that at that time, some of the village of Dabarita, who watched in the field, set upon Ptolomaeus, who was factor for Agrippa, and his sister Bernice, and spoiled them of all carriage, wherein was much costly apparrell, and many silver cups, and six hundred pieces of gold. And for that they could not doe this secretly, they brought all the whole bootie to Ioseph at Tarichea: who reproving them for offering violence unto the Kings servants, commanded the things to be kept at the house of Aeneas, who was one of the richest men in the town, who should restore them to the owner when time served: wherein thinking to doe himselfe great good, he wrought himself much danger. For the thieves being offended that they received no part thereof, and seeing that Ioseph would restore to Agrippa and his sister Bernice that which they had laboured to get, they went round about the villages in the night, and spread this false report in every place, that Ioseph was a traitor to his countrey, and with the same rumour filled the cities thereabout. So that early in the next morning, 100000. armed men came against Ioseph. Finally, the multitude assembling themselves together in the Theater at Tarichea, the greatest part cried out in their choler and fury, that the traitor might be deposed, other some that he might be burned, and Iohn himselfe incited many, and with him one Iesus the sonne of Sapphus, who at that time was Governour of Tiberias. All the friends of Ioseph and his guard being terrified with such a multitude fled, foure onely excepted. But Ioseph in the mean while was asleep: and had he slept a little longer, they had set his house on fire. Whereupon he arose, and the foure that remained with him, counselled him to flie: but he not dismaied in that he was left alone, nor for that so great a multitude came against him, went boldly towards them with his garment all torn and ashes upon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his sword upon his neck. Whereat they that bare him good will, especially the people of Tarichea, were moved to compassion: but the countrey people and they whom he overlaid with taxes and tributes, cursed him, and bad him bring forth the publike treasure, and confesse his treason: for because of the attire and habit he came in; they thought he would not have denied any thing whereof he was accused, and that he came so to move them to compassion, and so to obtain pardon for his offence. This his humilitie stood him in good stead, for hereby those that before were enraged against him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalfe, when he promised to confesse the whole matter: and then obtaining licence to speak, he said: I was never minded to send back that money to Agrippa, nor to keep it unto my private use. For (God forbid) that I should ever hold him for my friend, who is your open enemy, or that I should so seek mine own profit, that I should thereby damnishe you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea) for as much as I perceived that your Citie especially had greatest need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the walles, and for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adjoyning, who still gaped after this prey and wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get those spoiles for you to reedifie your walles. If ye mislike this, I will bring out the treasure, and give it to be divided amongst you: but if you like thereof, then it appeareth how you molest him who is your benefactor.

This speech of his well pleased the people of Tarichea, and displeased them of Tiberias; so that they breathed out threatnings against him. Thus they both left Ioseph, and fought one against another. He now having many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almost forty thousand) spake more boldly unto the multitude, and rebuked their temerity; affirming that it was necessary to strengthen Tarichea with that present money, and that he would also provide to strengthen other cities, and that they should not want money, if they would agree and conspire together against them, from whom they should take it; and not to offer violence unto him who would endeavour to get it. So the rest of the multitude being deceived, though they were angry, yet departed; and 2000. armed men offered to set upon him:

but he being already retired into his house, they stood without, threatening him. Wherefore Joseph used another device likewise to repress these: and getting up into the top of the house, he beckned unto them with his hand to keep silence; and then said, that he was ignorant what they requested at his hands: for he could not heare one for another, because their voices were confounded through the multitude; but if they would send some into the house to talk friendly with him, he would doe whatsoever they requested. The nobles and magistrates hearing this, presently went into the house: whom, when he had led into the inner-most part of the house, having shut the doores, he caused to be beaten, so long till that all their bowels appeared: the doores in the mean time being made fast, the people staid before the house, thinking that the cause of their long tarrying was, to alledge reasons to and fro; and presently Joseph opening the doores, put them forth amongst the people all bloody as they were: whereat they were so terrified, that leaving their weapons behinde them they ran away. Hereat John took occasion to encrease his envie; and having ill successe in this policy, he still attempted other plots to bring Joseph in danger: and counterfeiting himselfe sick, he requested Joseph to permit him to go to Tiberias, and use the hot baths for to recover his health. But Joseph not having yet perceived his treason, wrote letters in his behalfe to the governour of the town, willing him to be Johns oast, and to let him want nothing that he needed: which he had in good sort. And two daies after his arrivall there, he went about the businessse, which he came to effect, and enticed some with money, others with flatteries, to revolt from Joseph. Sitas whom Joseph had made Governour of the City understanding this, he presently by letters gave notice thereof to Joseph: who receiving them in the night, went to Tiberias, and was there early in the morning, and the rest of the multitude came out to meet him: but John notwithstanding he judged that he came against him, yet still he counter-feited himselfe sick in bed, and sent a man of his acquaintance to excuse his absence for not coming to meet Joseph. Then Joseph assembled the Tiberians together in a place to speak unto them, concerning that which was written unto him: and John sent armed men thither with commandement to kill Joseph. The people perceiving them to draw their swords, cried out: and Joseph at their cry looking about him, and perceiving their swords even almost at his throat, he leapt down a little hill upon the shore, which was six cubits high, upon which he stood to speak unto the people: and going into a boat with two of his guard which he found there, he went into the midst of the lake, and presently his guard taking their weapons assaulted the traitors. Joseph fearing that a great conflict would ensue, and so the whole citie for a few mens fault be destroyed, sent to his souldiers, charging them onely to work their own safety and no more, and to kill none, nor reprove any for that wicked fact: who forthwith obeying his command, ceased from fight.

But they that inhabited about the City, and heard of the treason, and by whom it was attempted, armed themselves and came against John: but he before they came, fled to Gif-cala, where he was born. In the mean while, all Galilees came and joyned with Joseph, and there were many thousands of armed men gathered together, affirming that they came against John, and to fire that citie which had received him. Joseph thanked them for their good will, saying that he had rather conquer his enemies by policy, then by fire and sword; and therefore requested them to be content. He also published an edict, wherein he declared that all those that had rebelled with John, and did not forsake him within 7. daies next following, should lose all their livings, and their mansions should be sacked, and their houses and family set on fire. Hereupon three thousand presently forsook John, and came and cast down their weapons before Josephs foere, prostrating themselves before him: so that there onely remained with John but one thousand of fugitive Syrians. By whom John being assisted, again went secretly to work, having so ill successe by plain dealing: and so privily sent messengers to Jerusalem, who told that Joseph had gathered a great army, and that except he were quickly prevented, he would come and usurpe the dominion over that mother City.
But the people understanding before of Johns hatred, did not regard it: yet divers rich men and magistrates who envied Joseph, secretly sent money unto John, to hire souldiers that were strangers, that he might war against Joseph; and determined amongst them, to displace him:
and thinking that their decree was not sufficient to effect it, they sent moreover five hundredth and foure thousand armed men, and foure of their principall nobility amongst them, to wit, Isaiah the Lawyer, and Ananias the Sadducee, & Simon and Judas the sons of Imathus, all very eloquent and learned men, to withdraw the peoples mindes from Joseph; giving them charge, that if he of his own accord came unto them, that then they should permit him to speak

A speak for himself: but if he refused so to do, that then they should hold him as an enemy. Ioseph's friends at Jerusalem gave him intelligence, that an army came against him; but for what cause they knew not, for that it was kept secret. And hereupon before he could prevent it, four Cities did revolt from him, to wit, Sephoris, Gamala, Giscala and Tiberias; the which he soon after easily recovered, without any force of arms: and having taken the four Captains and counsellors of his enemies, he sent them unto Jerusalem: against whom the people being incensed, would have killed them, and those that brought them; had they not fled betimes.

CHAP. XXVII.

Tiberias and Sephoris were recovered by Ioseph.

NOW Iohn, for fear of Ioseph, kept himself within the walls of Giscala: and a few dayes after Tiberias revolted again, the inhabitants calling in Agrippa, who came not at the day appointed, and yet a few Roman soldiers shewing themselves, they revolted from Ioseph. Ioseph understanding this at Tarichea, having sent his souldiers to fetch corn, thought it not good to go alone against the Rebels, neither did he think it best to delay the time any longer, fearing that whilest he delayed, King Agrippa would come and possesse the town: for the next day, because it was the Sabbath, he could do nothing. Wherefore he thought to overcome the Rebels by policie, and so he commanded the gates of Tarichea to be kept shut, that his intent might not be revealed unto them of Tiberias. Then taking all the boats that were in the lake, in number two hundred and thirtie, and in every one of them four saylers, he hastily sayled to Tiberias: and when he came neer the Citie, yet so farre off that the inhabitants thereof could not easily descry him, he left all the boats upon the water emptie, and taking onely seven of his guard with him, unarmed, he went neer unto the Citie, that they might see him. When the rebels perceived him, and thought that the boats had been full of armed men, they cast down their weapons, and held up their hands to him, beseeching him to spare the citie. Ioseph, after many threatening and bitter speeches, first, for that having undertaken warres against the Romanes, they with civill warres consumed their own forces; secondly, for that they had sought his life, who had wrought their safetie, and that they were not ashamed to shut the gates against him, who had builded the city wals: yet (said he) if any would come and talk with him, and confirm a league of their fidelity unto him, he would not refuse them. So ten of the chieftest among them came unto him, whom he carried away in a fisher-boat farre from the citie, and sent for fiftie Senators, as though he requested their promise also. And devising new causes, he still under pretence of agreement sent first for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the boats: which done, he commanded all the boatmen with all speed possible to go to Tarichea, and put them in prison, so that he carried away all the counsell, which were in number six hundred and two thousand people, all whom he brought to Tarichea in boats. But they which remained in the Citie, cried with one voice, that one Clitus was cause of that revolt, and therefore besought Ioseph to punish him for all. Ioseph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one of his guard called Levia, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to trust himself amongst all his enemies, refused to do execution. Clitus perceiving that Ioseph was angry, and ready to come out of his own boat to do it himself, besought him to grant him one of his hands: which Ioseph did, upon condition, that he should cut off the other himself. So Clitus drawing out his sword with his right hand, cut off his left, being afraid of Ioseph, and after this, he returned to Tiberias to bring it again under his subjection: and within a few dayes after, he took Giscala and Sephoris, which were revolted, having given the spoils thereof to his souldiers, but yet afterward he restored all that was taken away, unto the people, and so he did to the inhabitants of Tiberias and Sephoris: and by this means got the good will of them all.

How the people of Jerusalem prepared themselves to warre, and of the tyranny of SIMON GIORA.
